George Mason University School of Law
Working Paper Series

Year 2005

Paper 33

Expressive Association after Dale

David E. Bernstein*

*George Mason University, dbernste@gmu.edu

This working paper is hosted by The Berkeley Electronic Press (bepress) and may not be commercially reproduced without the permission of the copyright holder.

<http://law.bepress.com/gmulwps/art33>

Copyright ©2005 by the author.

Expressive Association after Dale

David E. Bernstein

Abstract

The right to join with other people to promote a particular outlook, known as the right of expressive association, is a necessary adjunct to the right of freedom of speech, which is protected by the First Amendment of the United States Constitution. In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, the United States Supreme Court found that the Boy Scouts of America had a First Amendment expressive association right to exclude a homosexual adult volunteer. Dale is likely to prove to be one of the most important First Amendment cases of recent years, because the Court enforced a broad right of expressive association against the competing claims of an antidiscrimination law.

The right to expressive association had languished in obscurity for more than two decades after the Supreme Court articulated it in the late 1950s and early 1960s in the course of protecting civil rights activists from racist Southern governments. Controversy over constitutional protection of expressive association arose in the 1980s, when private associations claimed that it protected their right to discriminate when necessary to pursue the associations' goals. The Supreme Court seemed aghast that the expressive association right was being used as a tool of those who would seek to use its protection of their associative status in order to discriminate. In a series of opinions in the mid to late 1980s, the Court both narrowly defined the circumstances in which expressive association rights are impinged, and suggested that antidiscrimination laws are always "compelling government interests" sufficient to override these rights. The right of expressive association had been significantly weakened.

Dale, however, dramatically revived the right of expressive association. The Court found that the Boy Scouts had an expressive association right to exclude gay scoutmasters even though the Scouts' anti-homosexual activity policy was neither well-publicized nor especially central to its mission. Moreover, the Court rejected New Jersey's claim that the law was justified by the state's compelling interest in eradicating discrimination against homosexuals.

The essay examines the right of expressive association and the consequences of its reinvigoration by the Supreme Court in Dale. Part I recounts the ups and downs of the right from its inception in civil rights cases, to its low ebb in the 1980s, to its reinvigoration in Dale. Part II discusses some of the scholarly commentary on Dale and concludes that the right to expressive association after Dale will continue to be a broad one, with some limitations. Part III discusses some of the post-Dale decisions that support the interpretation of Dale as expounding a broad-based expressive association right fully applicable to a variety of situations. Finally, Part IV looks at some of the untapped potential uses of the right. In particular, Dale will often shield religious associations from intrusive antidiscrimination laws.

EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION AFTER Dale
by David E. Bernstein
Professor
George Mason University School of Law

INTRODUCTION

The right to join with other people to promote a particular outlook, known as the right of expressive association, is a necessary adjunct to the right of freedom of speech, which is protected by the First Amendment of the United States Constitution. Freedom of speech would be of little practical consequence if the government could suppress ideas by bluntly prohibiting individuals from gathering with others who share their perspective. Freedom of expression must consist of more than the right to talk to oneself.

Freedom of speech could also be more subtly eroded if the government could force organizations dedicated to promoting a particular perspective to accept as members individuals who have a conflicting perspective. Such members would immediately dilute an organization's message because their membership would confuse public perceptions of the organization. In the longer term, dissenting members forced upon an organization by the government could achieve sufficient power to change the organization's values. For example, if the government if a gay rights organization in Mississippi could not control its membership, conservative Christian activists could join and ultimately take over the organization. Conversely, a conservative Christian organization in San Francisco banned from discriminating in selecting members would be at risk of a takeover by gay rights activists.

Concerns about the autonomy of private, non-profit organizations recently led the United

The logo for the bePress Legal Repository, featuring a stylized image of a classical building facade on the left and the text "bePress Legal Repository" in a serif font on the right.

States Supreme Court to issue a rousing endorsement of the right of expressive association. In the 2000 case of Boy Scouts of America v. Dale,¹ the Court found that because the Boy Scouts of America (BSA) as an organization promotes a belief in chastity outside of marriage, the BSA had a First Amendment expressive association right to exclude an openly homosexual adult volunteer. Dale is likely to prove to be one of the most important First Amendment cases of recent years, because the Court enforced a broad right of expressive association against the competing claims of antidiscrimination laws.

The United States Supreme Court first articulated the right of expressive association in the course of protecting civil rights activists from racist Southern governments in the late 1950s and early 1960s. For the next two decades, the right to expressive association languished in relative obscurity as few relevant cases were decided. Renewed controversy over constitutional protection of expressive association arose in the 1980s, when private associations claimed the right to discriminate in membership when such discrimination would aid the associations in pursuing their goals.

The Supreme Court seemed aghast that the expressive association right, with its origins in the civil rights struggle, had been embraced by those who sought to use it as a shield against antidiscrimination laws. In a series of opinions in the mid to late 1980s, the Court both narrowly defined the circumstances in which expressive association rights are impinged, and suggested that antidiscrimination laws are always “compelling government interests” sufficient to override these rights. Expressive association rights had become a virtual nullity, at least in cases involving competing anti-discrimination claims.

Dale, however, dramatically revived the right of expressive association. The Court found that the Boy Scouts had an expressive association right to exclude gay scoutmasters even though the Scouts' anti-homosexual activity policy was neither well-publicized nor central to its mission. Moreover, the Court rejected New Jersey's claim that the law was justified by the state's compelling interest in eradicating discrimination against homosexuals.

The essay will examine the right of expressive association and the consequences of its reinvigoration at the hands of the Supreme Court in Dale. Part I recounts the ups and downs of the right from its inception in civil rights cases almost fifty years ago, to its low ebb following the Court's 1984 decision in Roberts v. United States Jaycees,² to its reinvigoration in Dale. Part II will discuss reactions to Dale and conclude that after Dale expressive association rights will receive vigorous, but not unlimited, protection. Part III will discuss post-Dale lower court decisions that implicitly interpret Dale as adopting a broad-based expressive association right fully applicable to a variety of situations. Finally, Part IV will look at some of the untapped potential uses of the right of expressive association.

I. THE RISE AND (TEMPORARY) FALL OF THE RIGHT OF EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION

The significance of Dale's broad protection of the right of expressive association is apparent when one considers the earlier trend established by the Court's previous decisions in the area. Pre-Dale decisions reflected an ebb and flow that saw the right develop from a powerful shield for civil rights organizations to a neglected weak sibling of the First Amendment.

A. Origins of the Right to Expressive Association

The first explicit recognition of the right of expressive association by the United States Supreme Court came in the 1950's, when the civil rights movement in the South was gathering steam. In NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson,³ the question before the Court was whether the State of Alabama—a state that rigorously enforced discriminatory laws against African Americans—could compel the Alabama branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the leading civil rights organization in the state, to reveal to the state Attorney General the names and addresses of its members. The state planned to turn these names over to local “White Citizens’ Councils.” The state expected that the Councils would use the information to help squelch the growing civil rights movement by harassing NAACP members. Here we see an example of how expressive association rights are necessary for the exercise of free speech rights; African Americans in the South could never have succeeded in promoting their pro-civil rights message to the American public if the Southern states had been permitted to decimate civil rights organizations like the NAACP.

The Court found that requiring the NAACP to turn over its membership lists illicitly infringed on NAACP members’ right to expressive association. In discussing the right of expressive association, the Court stated that “[i]t is beyond debate that freedom to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas is an inseparable aspect of the ‘liberty’ assured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which embraces freedom of speech.”⁴ The Court added that it was “immaterial whether the beliefs sought to be advanced by association pertain to political, economic, religious or cultural matters”; rather, regulation that might have the effect of burden freedom of expressive association would receive “the closest scrutiny.”⁵ Given the relatively minor benefit of disclosure to the State’s asserted interest of determining whether the NAACP was engaged in technical violations of state law, the Court determined that Alabama had failed to show a compelling interest sufficient to overcome the “deterrent effect on the free enjoyment of the right to associate” that compelled disclosure was likely to have.⁶

Following Patterson, the Court decided several other expressive association cases pitting the associational rights of the NAACP and its members against the obstructionist policies of state governments in the South.⁷ In each of these cases, the Court applied strict scrutiny—the highest level of scrutiny the Court gives to regulations, requiring that to pass constitutional muster a regulation must be narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling governmental interest—to the asserted state interest involved and resolved the cases in favor of associational rights.⁸ Application of strict scrutiny is known as the “compelling interest test.”

While the Court strictly protected expressive association rights in cases involving racial discrimination, such assertions by the Communist Party were less well received. In two cases in the early 1960’s, the Court found that national security concerns overrode the Communist Party’s freedom of association rights, upholding legislation requiring the Party to relinquish its membership lists.⁹ The only case involving Communism from this era in which the Court sided with expressive association also involved racial discrimination. In Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee,¹⁰ a committee of the Florida Legislature attempted to gain access to the membership list of the Miami branch of the NAACP for the stated purpose of investigating whether its members were involved with the Communist Party. The Court found that there was no evidence of any substantial relationship between the NAACP and Communist activities, and therefore no compelling state interest in acquiring the membership records.¹¹

B. A Shift in Focus Brings A Shift in Application

Expressive association cases largely died out for a time after the civil rights movement achieved its major legislative goals the 1960s, rendering moot attempts by state government to stifle the movement, and with the end of the Red Scare of the 1950s. Ironically, the civil rights movement's legislative triumphs also sowed the seeds for new litigation over expressive association. Following the federal government's lead, states began to either pass new laws or enforce old laws guaranteeing African Americans and other beneficiaries of the civil rights movement equal access to "places of public accommodation." When these laws were passed, legislatures had in mind restaurants, hotels, theaters, and other public spaces. Some state courts gradually expanded their interpretations of public accommodation laws so that they covered private membership organizations, even those with no permanent meeting places. The phrase "place of public accommodation" was stretched to include the membership policies of these organizations, despite the obvious semantic problem with fitting that particular square peg into that particular round hole. States courts that applied public accommodation laws to membership organizations held that they could not discriminate against protected groups with regard to their membership policies. Thus, a new class of expressive association litigants was born—membership organizations raising the right of expressive association as a defense against antidiscrimination laws.

*Roberts v. United States Jaycees*¹² involved the assertion of the right to expressive association by a membership organization that sought exemption from a state public accommodation law prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sex. At the time, the United States Jaycees admitted only men between the ages of 18 and 35 as full members, although it allowed women to be associate members with no voting or office-holding rights.¹³ In 1974 and 1975, two Minnesota chapters of the organization began admitting women as full members. The

Jaycees' national organization imposed sanctions against the chapters for this violation of membership rules, and began proceedings to revoke their charters.¹⁴

The chapters then filed a complaint with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights, contending that the Jaycees' membership rules violated Minnesota's law banning discrimination in public accommodations.¹⁵ The national Jaycees sought relief against the law in federal court, arguing that the law impinged on the right of expressive association.¹⁶ The Jaycees noted that their charter called for the organization to "promote the interests of young men," a presumptively easier task for an organization with an all-male membership than for a mixed-sex organization.

The National Jaycees lost at the district court level, but won on appeal before the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals.¹⁷ The Eighth Circuit held that the national Jaycees had a right to associate as the means to achieve their expressive ends, including the advancement of the interests of young men, and that allowing women as full members would directly burden that right.¹⁸ The Eighth Circuit also found that Minnesota's asserted compelling interest, the prevention of discrimination in places of public accommodation on the basis of sex, was not sufficiently compelling to overcome the national Jaycees' right to expressive association.¹⁹

Minnesota appealed, and the United States Supreme Court, reversed the Eighth Circuit's ruling. Justice William Brennan wrote the 5-0 opinion for the Court. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor filed a concurring opinion, Justice William Rehnquist concurred without an opinion, and two Justices did not participate. Brennan's opinion, while acknowledging a broad right to expressive association, and recognizing that the central purpose of the national Jaycees was the promotion of the interests of young men, held that forcing the organization to admit women as full members would not impact the national Jaycees' right to expressive association.²⁰ Brennan stated that there was no evidence that the admission of women would substantially impair the organization's promotion of the interests of young men, and that without further evidence he would "decline to indulge in the sexual stereotyping that underlies appellee's contention that, by allowing women to vote, application of the Minnesota Act will change the content or impact of the organization's speech."²¹

Brennan added that even if Minnesota's public accommodations law did impinge on expressive association, and the Court therefore had to apply strict scrutiny, the law served Minnesota's compelling interest in eliminating discrimination and ensuring its citizens equal access to publicly available goods and services. Moreover, the law was narrowly tailored because it abridged the National Jaycees' expressive association rights only insofar as it was necessary to accomplish the Act's purpose.²² Brennan also suggested that discriminatory practices were analogous to "violence or other types of potentially expressive activities that produce special harms distinct from their communicative impact" and that such activities were "entitled to no constitutional protection".²³

Brennan's opinion in Roberts is significant in two respects. First, Brennan tendentiously interpreted the facts to find that expressive association rights were not impinged. Brennan's assertion that it is merely stereotypical thinking to assume that women as a group are less inclined than young men as a group to desire to promote the interests of young men seems almost laughable.²⁴ Second, and even more significant, Brennan characterized the Jaycees' discriminatory practices as akin to violence and not worthy of constitutional protection, and therefore gave the right of expressive association short shrift in his compelling interest analysis. In adopting this argument, the Court sent the message that expressive association was far less important than other First Amendment rights.²⁵

Justice O'Connor's concurring opinion in Roberts was far narrower. She recognized that an association's right to define its membership is an important part of the right of expressive association. She nevertheless believed that the Jaycees were not entitled to claim the right because they were primarily a "commercial" association—providing networking contacts to young businesspeople—rather than a primarily expressive one.²⁶

After the Roberts opinion, the Court rejected two other expressive association challenges to public accommodations laws, and in doing so reinforcing the idea that the right to expressive association was a weak constitutional right at best.²⁷ In Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte, the Court held that Rotary International, a membership organization, could not revoke the membership of a local Rotary Club that admitted two female members in violation of Rotary International's policy. As in Roberts, the Duarte Court argued that requiring the admission of female members would not hinder the advancement of the club's purposes.²⁸ The Court also applied the same lax version of strict scrutiny it had used in Roberts, finding that any infringement on the right to expressive association was justified by the State's compelling interest in eliminating discrimination against women.²⁹

Similarly, in N.Y. State Club Ass'n v. City of New York, the Court brushed aside a challenge by a consortium of New York private clubs and associations to the application of the New York City Human Rights Laws' antidiscrimination provision. While acknowledging the existence of a right to expressive association, the Court stated that the New York law at issue did not on its face "affect 'in any significant way' the ability of individuals to form associations that will advocate public or private viewpoints."³⁰

The Court's apparent disdain for expressive association claims had marked effect on lower courts. Following the Brennan's opinion in Roberts, lower federal courts and state supreme courts routinely held that the right of expressive association had to yield to antidiscrimination statutes.³¹

C. The Tide Begins to Turn

From the mid-1980's to 1995, protection of the right of expressive association was at a low ebb, with courts generally refusing to enforce it in the face of conflicting antidiscrimination legislation. However, the tide began to turn in favor of expressive association, beginning with the 1995 Supreme Court opinion in Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian & Bisexual Group of Boston.³²

In Hurley, the Boston Irish-American Gay, Lesbian & Bisexual Group (GLIB) sought to require the organizers of Boston's St. Patrick's Day Parade to allow the organization to march under its own banner. GLIB argued that the privately-sponsored parade was subject to Massachusetts' public accommodations law, which banned discrimination against homosexuals.³³ The organizers of the parade countered that the admission of GLIB to the parade would violate their right to expressive association by forcing them to convey a sexual message.³⁴

The trial court, following the Roberts methodology, found that any burden on the organizers right to expressive association caused by allowing GLIB to march in the parade was merely "incidental."³⁵ Further, the trial court held that this incidental burden was justified by Massachusetts' interest in "eradicating discrimination."³⁶ The Massachusetts Supreme Court affirmed.³⁷

However, the United States Supreme Court reversed in a unanimous opinion written by

bepress Legal Repository

Justice David Souter. The Court noted that the organizers of the parade disclaimed any interest in excluding homosexuals generally from the parade, but rather were seeking to bar GLIB from marching as its own parade unit under its own banner. The Court stated that “[s]ince every participating unit affects the message conveyed by the private organizers, the state courts’ application of the statute produced an order essentially requiring petitioners to alter the expressive content of their parade.”³⁸ Thus, according to the Court, the Massachusetts’ courts’ application of the public accommodations statute had the effect of “declaring the sponsor’s speech itself to be the public accommodation,” which was contrary to the fundamental rule of the First Amendment that “a speaker has the autonomy to choose the content of his own message.”³⁹

The Court distinguished Roberts, as well as New York State Club Association, by noting that in those cases “compelled access to the benefit [provided by the organization] . . . did not trespass on the organization’s message itself.”⁴⁰ Here, according to the Court, even if the parade could be called a public accommodation, “GLIB could still be refused admission as its own parade unit in the same manner that a private club could exclude an applicant whose manifest views were at odds with a position taken by the club’s existing members.”⁴¹ Interestingly, there was no mention of the compelling interest test.

The Court’s decision in Hurley seemed to halt the trend away from protection of the right to expressive association, but its implications were somewhat ambiguous. The Hurley opinion was unclear as to whether its holding relied on the right to expressive association or on the right to free speech, and whether there was a meaningful distinction between these two rights. However, the Court’s decision in Dale soon initiated a dramatic change in the legal status of the right to expressive association.

D. Dale: The Right Reinvigorated

The issue in Dale was whether the Boy Scouts of America (BSA), could revoke the membership of an assistant scoutmaster due to his acknowledged (and publicly-known) homosexuality. Dale had become active in scouting at the age of eight, and had continued his involvement through age eighteen, ultimately achieving the rank of Eagle Scout.⁴² He applied for adult membership in the Boy Scouts, and was approved for the position of assistant scoutmaster for a Boy Scout Troop. In 1989, Dale left home to attend college, and there first acknowledged his homosexuality. While at college, he attained a leadership position in a campus group advocating homosexual interests.⁴³ In July 1990, a newspaper published an interview it had conducted with Dale at a seminar addressing the psychological and health needs of homosexual teenagers. In the article, which was accompanied by Dale's photograph and identified his leadership position with the campus advocacy group, Dale spoke about his advocacy of homosexual teens' need for homosexual role models.⁴⁴

Following the publication of the article, Dale received a letter from the local scouting council revoking his membership on the basis that the "the Boy Scouts 'specifically forbid membership to homosexuals.'"⁴⁵ Dale filed a complaint against the BSA in state court, alleging that the revocation of his membership had violated New Jersey's public accommodations statute.⁴⁶

The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the BSA. The court held, among other things, that the BSA's position with regard to homosexuality was clear and that forcing the BSA to allow Dale to be an adult member and scout leader would violate the BSA's right to expressive association.⁴⁷ The New Jersey Superior Court of Appeals, however, reversed.⁴⁸ With regard to the right to expressive association, the Court of Appeals, in a very Roberts-like opinion, first determined that forcing the BSA to allow Dale as a member would not significantly affect the BSA's ability to express its views or carry out its interests.⁴⁹ The court then distinguished Hurley, determining that it had involved "pure forms of speech" rather than expressive association, and that Hurley's reference to expressive association was dicta.⁵⁰ The court also followed Roberts's lead by applying a weak version of strict scrutiny and concluding that any infringement was justified by New Jersey's compelling interest in eradicating discrimination.⁵¹

The New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed.⁵² The court found that the forced inclusion of Dale as a member would not significantly affect the ability of the BSA to disseminate its message, because the BSA did not associate to promote the message that homosexuality is immoral.⁵³ The court invoked Roberts for the proposition that "[s]tate laws against discrimination may take precedence over the right of expressive association because 'acts of invidious discrimination in the distribution of publicly available goods, services and other advantages cause unique evils that the government has a compelling interest to prevent.'"⁵⁴ Finally, the court determined that any infringement on the BSA's right to expressive association was justified by the New Jersey's compelling interest in preventing discrimination.⁵⁵

The opinions of the New Jersey Superior Court of Appeals and the New Jersey Supreme Courts were consistent with the expressive association doctrine the United States Supreme Court had developed in Roberts and its progeny. However, the U.S. Supreme Court's reversed the lower courts' holdings in 5-4 opinion written by Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

In Dale, the Court started off by noting that in Roberts, Duarte and New York State Club Association it had applied the compelling interest test to public accommodations laws that allegedly infringed on associational rights. The Court, however, then emphasized that “forced inclusion of an unwanted person in a group infringes on the group’s freedom of expressive association if the presence of that person affects in a significant way the group’s ability to advocate public or private viewpoints.”⁵⁶ Then, in contrast its rulings in the Roberts line of cases, in which the Court had carefully evaluated whether the antidiscrimination laws in question truly infringed on the organizations’ expressive activities, the majority opinion in Dale stated that “it is not the role of the courts to reject a group’s expressed values because they disagree with those values or find them internally inconsistent.”⁵⁷ The Court noted that the record contained evidence of the BSA’s belief that homosexual conduct is not “morally straight,” and declined further inquiry into the sincerity of that belief.⁵⁸

In further contrast to the dismissive manner in which the Court in Roberts and its progeny had determined whether expressive association rights were impaired, the majority in Dale stated that deference should be given to an organization’s view of what would impair its expression.⁵⁹ The Court concluded, analogizing the case to Hurley, that “the presence of Dale as an assistant scoutmaster would just as surely interfere with the Boy Scouts’ choice not to propound a point of view contrary to its beliefs.”⁶⁰ In determining that Dale’s inclusion would significantly affect the BSA’s right of expressive association, the Court rejected the New Jersey Supreme Court’s finding that there was no significant impairment because the purpose of the BSA’s association was not to disseminate the belief that homosexuality is immoral. The U.S. Supreme Court found that: (1) associations do not have to associate for the purpose of disseminating a specific message to be entitled to First Amendment protection; (2) even if the BSA discourages leaders from disseminating views on sexual issues, this does not negate the sincerity of its belief that homosexuality is immoral; and (3) the First Amendment simply does not require that every member of a group agree on every issue in order for the group's policy to be "expressive association."⁶¹

The Court proceeded to apply the compelling interest test. The Roberts line of cases suggested that the compelling interest test always justified antidiscrimination laws challenged on expressive association grounds. In Dale, the Court gave the test short shrift, stating simply that "[t]he state interests embodied in New Jersey's public accommodations law do not justify such a severe intrusion on the Boy Scouts' rights to freedom of expressive association."⁶² Dale left no doubt that the compelling interest test as used in Roberts and its progeny, through which a state's interest in eradicating discrimination always trumped expressive association rights, had been repudiated. Even though Dale was a 5-4 decision, not even the dissenters argued for the use of the Roberts-style compelling interest test.⁶³ Rather, the dissenters argued that the BSA's anti-homosexual activity message was too vague, unpublicized, and irrelevant to the organization's core mission to warrant protection under the expressive association paradigm.

The majority opinion in Dale marks a substantial step toward the recognition of expressive association as a full-fledged First Amendment right with the same weight as the general right of free speech. The right to expressive association had been treated by Roberts and its progeny as a second-class right, which could be infringed upon in most instances due to the narrow definition of an association's expressive interests and the lax nature of the compelling interest test that the Court used in those cases. Dale, in contrast, held that the expressive association right could be asserted by an organization even though the organization does not associate for the purpose of expressing a particular message, propounds that message only implicitly, and tolerates dissenting views. Moreover, under Dale the courts will no longer defer to governments' claims that their invasions of expressive association rights serve interests sufficiently compelling to justify those invasions, but will instead skeptically review such claims.

II. REACTION TO DALE

Reaction to Dale and its possible implications has been mixed, and ranges across a wide spectrum of constitutional philosophy. On one extreme is Richard Epstein, who applauds the Court for its reinvigorated enforcement of the right to expressive association, yet argues that the Court's opinion did not go far enough, and that the Court should have recognized that the state has no interest in counteracting discrimination by groups that lack monopoly power.⁶⁴ According to Epstein, Dale's reasoning should be extended to non-expressive organizations, including for-profit businesses not organized for a particular expressive purpose: if the First Amendment applies, as the Dale opinion suggests, to all situations where the organization merely engages in expressive activity that could be impaired, then "every organization engages in expressive activity when it projects itself to its own members and to the rest of the world."⁶⁵

Epstein argues that courts should not apply a comprehensive test that would attempt to apply the government's interest in antidiscrimination legislation to "to the literally thousands of organizations that engage in business, charitable, religious, or recreational endeavors, or some mixture thereof." Rather, courts should adopt a test that recognizes a broad unity between the rules that treat private property, freedom of contract and freedom of speech as equals, allowing state regulation only under the traditional police power grounds, such as the prevention of monopolies.⁶⁶ Today, by contrast, property and contract rights are given short shrift by the courts relative to freedom of speech.

While Epstein argues that Dale did not go far enough, Andrew Koppelman argues that the Dale opinion is “sheer lunacy.”⁶⁷ Like Epstein, Koppelman agrees that under the Court’s opinion in Dale, “almost any organization is eligible for the protection from antidiscrimination laws that the Court provides.”⁶⁸ Koppelman contends that the Court’s statement that an association need only engage in expressive activity that could be impaired in order to receive protection, coupled with its statement that it will not question the association’s statement of its expressive purpose and will defer to the association’s view of what would impair that purpose, means that “an expressive association claim is available to any entity that wants to discriminate at any time for any purpose.”⁶⁹

Others scholars contend that Dale’s impact won’t be so dramatic. Dale Carpenter argues that Dale will not have “the revolutionary consequences” that either its “harsh critics,” such as Koppelman, or “most libertarian cheerleaders,” such as Epstein, predict.⁷⁰ He contends that the crucial distinction the Court will make after Dale in the area of expressive association will be akin to the approach suggested by Justice O’Connor’s concurrence in Roberts. The Court will provide Dale’s heightened protection to organizations whose activities are primarily expressive, while other groups whose activities are primarily commercial will receive a minimal level of protection.⁷¹ Carpenter contends that this distinction is also somewhat analogous to the Court’s treatment of core political and commercial speech.⁷² He also argues that this distinction is consistent with the results in both Roberts and Dale because the Jaycees was a primarily commercial organization, while the BSA is primarily expressive. Carpenter concludes that “there is little doubt that a majority of the Court is now following Justice O’Connor’s approach to associational freedom,” even though Dale did not articulate this explicitly.⁷³

Other scholars have suggested that Dale does not signal a complete repudiation of the Roberts standard, but is rather an anomaly generated by the parties involved: the venerable institution of the BSA on the one hand, and the homosexual minority and their tenuous social and legal status on the other.⁷⁴ In particular, commentators who hold this view argue that the Court’s ruling would have been different in a case concerning race or sex discrimination.⁷⁵ Some attribute this difference to the Court’s majority’s lack of sympathy for gay rights, suggesting that the Court believes that eradicating discrimination against African Americans or women, but not gays, is a compelling government interest.

Others have suggested that the source of the distinction between cases involving gays and other expressive associations is the Court’s equal protection jurisprudence. For equal protection purposes, the Court engages in strict scrutiny of laws that classify by race (requiring that the classification at issue be narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest), intermediate scrutiny of laws that classify by sex (requiring a that the classification serve important government interests and be substantially related to the achievement of that goal), and rational basis scrutiny (requiring merely that a classification be rationally related to a legitimate state interest rest on grounds not wholly irrelevant to the achievement of the State’s objective) for laws that classify by sexual orientation. Antidiscrimination laws will be protected from expressive association claims under the compelling interest test based on the degree of protection the group facing discrimination receives under equal protection doctrine. It should be noted that scholars who hold such views are speculating, and that there is nothing in Dale that suggests that race discrimination cases would get treated differently than sexual orientation discrimination cases. Quite the contrary, the Court wrote that “public or judicial disapproval of a tenet of an organization's expression does not justify the State's effort to compel the organization to accept members where such acceptance would derogate from the organization's expressive message.”⁷⁶

It seems likely that Dale does mark a turning point in the judicial treatment of the right of expressive association, regardless of which group is harmed by the discrimination at issue. In contrast to the limited and toothless right given lip service by the Court in Roberts, Dale establishes expressive association as a robust First Amendment right. I agree with Professor Carpenter that the right to expressive association is likely limited by the primarily expressive/primarily commercial dichotomy that Justice O'Connor enunciated in her concurrence in Roberts. Justice O'Connor's vote was necessary to secure the 5-4 majority in Dale, and its result is consistent with the application of the dichotomy of her Roberts concurrence, thus suggesting that Dale does not represent a change in her views. The defense of the right of expressive association is probably limited solely to nonprofit organizations, as it would be difficult to argue that a profit-making enterprise exists primarily for noncommercial purposes.

III. CASE LAW FOLLOWING DALE

The Supreme Court has not addressed the right of expressive association since Dale. However, the limited cases in the lower courts since Dale generally support the theory that Dale has ushered in a new era of broad protection of the right to expressive association. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, for example, relied in part on Dale in holding that the Department of Housing and Urban Development could not launch a civil rights investigation against homeowners who, for allegedly discriminatory reasons, organized opposition a plan to turn a motel into a group home. The court cited Dale for the proposition that “[t]he right to expressive association includes the right to pursue, as a group, discriminatory policies that are antithetical to the concept of equality for all persons.”⁷⁷

In *Donaldson v. Farrakhan*⁷⁸ the Supreme Court of Massachusetts found that forcing a Nation of Islam mosque to admit a woman to a men’s-only religious meeting would significantly burden the organization’s right of expressive association, and was not justified by a compelling government interest. This decision belies the notion that Dale’s holding is applicable only to cases involving discrimination against homosexuals, and that Roberts’s forgiving compelling interest test would otherwise apply. Had the Massachusetts Supreme Court relied on Roberts rather than Dale, the public accommodations statute would have prevailed as serving the compelling interest of eradicating discrimination against women.

Further evidence that the Roberts inquiry is no longer viable after Dale was provided by the D.C. Court of Appeals in Boy Scouts of America v. District of Columbia Commission on Human Rights.⁷⁹ This case, like Dale, involved the question of whether the BSA could deny membership to homosexuals. The D.C. Commission on Human Rights had found that the BSA could not claim an expressive association right to exclude homosexuals. The Commission had tried to distinguish Dale by arguing that it had conducted its own detailed examination of the BSA’s views with regard to homosexuality and concluded that the BSA did not truly express a position on the morality of homosexual relations.⁸⁰ On appeal by the BSA, the D.C. Court of Appeals rejected the Commission on Human Rights’ attempt to rely upon a Roberts-style detailed examination of the expressive position of the organization.⁸¹ Instead, the court found Dale to be controlling and ruled in favor of the BSA.

There has, however, been one case decided by the Third Circuit that has some restrictive

bepress Legal Repository

implications for the right of expressive association. In Pi Lambda Phi Fraternity, Inc. v. University of Pittsburgh,⁸² a fraternity that had been stripped of its status as a recognized student organization following a drug raid raised the right of expressive association in a lawsuit against the university. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals, not surprisingly, rejected the fraternity's claim.⁸³ However, as part of its analysis, the court determined that the fraternity was not engaged in expressive activity sufficient to qualify for First Amendment protection.⁸⁴ In reaching this conclusion, the court engaged in an extensive analysis of the fraternity chapter's activities, finding that it did nothing to perpetuate what the purported associational ideals of the national fraternity.⁸⁵ The court held that the chapter was therefore not engaged in expressive activity.⁸⁶ The court added that even if the fraternity was engaged in expressive activity, the University's conduct did not significantly infringe upon it.⁸⁷

Although the Third Circuit Court of Appeals' ultimate conclusion that the University's actions did not infringe on the fraternity's right of expressive association is correct, the court's determination that the fraternity was not engaged in expressive activity is belied by Dale. First, like Roberts but unlike Dale, the court analyzed of validity of the organization's expressive beliefs while ignoring its stated expressive purpose. Second, the court employed a highly restrictive definition of expressive behavior which equated the fraternal organization at issue with a for-profit dance club. Such a restrictive definition seems inconsistent with Dale's broad-based definition of expressive activity.⁸⁸ Although ultimately not necessary to its conclusion, the Third Circuit's analysis in Pi Lambda Phi serves notice that the specter of Roberts still haunts the area of expressive association.

IV. THE FUTURE OF EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION

Although the newly reinvigorated right of expressive association has seen only limited use in the short time since the Supreme Court's decision in Dale, it has enormous potential to effect the law in a variety of areas. One of those areas concerns the expressive association of religious organizations. Prior to Dale, religious associations who were burdened by antidiscrimination laws which conflicted with their religious beliefs were forced to rely on Free Exercise Clause arguments.⁸⁹ These claims were rarely successful, and with the Supreme Court's ruling in *Employment Division v. Smith*⁹⁰ that religious organizations had no right to be exempted from neutral, generally-applicable laws that burden their free exercise of religion, even this small chance of success faded.

After Dale, however, a religious association confronted with an antidiscrimination law that requires it to act in a way that inhibits its ability to promote its beliefs should be able to raise expressive association rights as a defense. For example, church schools have a right to fire unmarried teachers who become pregnant if sex outside of marriage is frowned on by their sponsoring church.⁹¹ Justice Scalia's concurring opinion in Good News Club v. Milford Central School,⁹² arguing that a public school's exclusion of a Christian student club from the use of school facilities impinges on the right of expressive association, is an indication that religious organizations will be among the beneficiaries of Dale.

Universities will also be a primary benefactor of the newly invigorated right of expressive association. The right of expressive association may be used to protect a private university's speech code against state statutes such as California's "Leonard Law," which requires private schools to follow the First Amendment requirements in regulating speech. A private university could conceivably win such an expressive association case if it can show that it is committed to maintaining a campus environment that is more open and inclusive to minority students, even at the expense of free speech on campus.⁹³ The First Amendment, which only restricts governmental activity, exists to protect pluralism from government attempts to impose orthodoxy, not to impose a free speech orthodoxy on private institutions. Protecting the expressive association rights of universities may decrease free speech on particular campuses, but overall increases social and ideological pluralism by allowing universities to choose their identities, and to lure like-minded faculty and students based on those identities.

If forced to make an explicit choice, many universities would undoubtedly choose to promote themselves as free speech havens, as many already have. Yale University, for example, has volunteered that it will not punish any speech on campus if that speech would be protected by the First Amendment protects against government action. Other universities would establish themselves as institutions devoted to particular religious and social ideologies, as many implicitly or explicitly already have. As Professor Randall Kennedy of Harvard Law School suggests, the proper response to private sector experimentation with speech rules is to “let a thousand flowers bloom.”⁹⁴ Freedom of speech and expressive association must include the right of private institutions to determine what speech they will and will not countenance.

Expressive association rights for speech codes are only necessary in the few jurisdictions like California where speech codes at private universities are illegal. A broader potential use for the right of expressive association by universities nationwide would be to protect affirmative action racial preferences in admission from laws banning discrimination in admissions. The United States Supreme Court recently held that such preferences are generally allowed,⁹⁵ but the decision was 5-4, with one of the Justices in the majority, Sandra Day O’Connor, rumored to be ready to retire soon. Moreover, while the Court's opinion permitted preferences, it did ban some commonly-practiced admissions tactics, including giving all African American applicants a blanket edge in admissions, regardless of individual circumstances.

The right of expressive association, however, may provide a defense to private universities that seek to avoid any present or future restrictions on affirmative action. Under Dale, universities can assert that they have a commitment to the promotion of racial diversity and assistance to disadvantaged minorities, and that the application of laws prohibiting racial preferences will significantly burden that right.⁹⁶

This approach is not perfect. Asserting a First Amendment defense against Title VI may be unavailing in the face of the Court's decision in Grove City College v. Bell.⁹⁷ In that case, the Court held that universities that receive federal funds could not claim a First Amendment right to refuse to comply with intrusive regulations promulgated by the federal government. The Court held the First Amendment was inapplicable because universities were not coerced into obeying Title IX regulations, and could evade them by simply refusing federal funds.⁹⁸ In theory, a court might similarly hold statutory restrictions on affirmative action do not violate the First Amendment for the same reason. However, as I have argued elsewhere, Grove City may not in fact be applicable, especially because the negative consequences for universities that disobey federal guidelines have grown dramatically since the Court decided that case.⁹⁹

CONCLUSION

The full magnitude of the change to the jurisprudence of the right of expressive association wrought by the Supreme Court's 2000 decision in Dale is still not clear. What is apparent is that Dale failed to follow the Roberts line of cases, and instead rejuvenated the right of expressive association. The right emerged from the decision in Dale as a robust shield for expressive associations against government attempts to directly or indirectly influence their ability to independently form and promote their messages. Further, although the lower court decisions are sparse and sometimes inconsistent, it appears that this expansive definition of the right has application beyond the facts and circumstances in Dale, although the scope of that right is neither as broad as some commentators have argued. Expressive association rights will limit the encroachment of antidiscrimination laws on the membership and employment policies of nonprofit associations, but will not provide a means for American businesses to evade those laws.

Much of the potential of the right of expressive association, however, remains untapped. In particular, as interpreted by Dale, the right of expressive association has great possibilities for use by religious organizations and private universities faced with antidiscrimination laws that would interfere with their ability to promote their ideologies. Expressive association may also ultimately protect the affirmative action policies of private universities from government intrusion.

1. 530 U.S. 640 (2000).
2. 468 U.S. 609 (1984).
3. 357 U.S. 449 (1958).
4. Id. at 460.
5. Id.
6. Id. at 462-66.
7. See Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 523-27 (1960)(requirement forcing NAACP to disclose membership lists violated freedom of expressive association); NAACP v. Alabama, ex rel. Flowers, 377 U.S. 290, 307-10 (1964)(order enjoining NAACP from conducting business violated freedom of expressive association); see generally NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963).

8. See Bates, 361 U.S. at 527; Flowers, 377 U.S. at 308-10; Button, 371 U.S. at 428-29.

9. Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72, 77-81 (1959); Communist Party of U.S. v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 90-104 (1961).

10. 372 U.S. 539 (1963).

11. Id. at 555-57.

12. 468 U.S. 609 (1984).

13. Id. at 612-13.

14. Id. at 614.

15. Id. at 614-15. The law in question prohibited the denial to “any person the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, and accommodations of a place of public accommodation because of race, color, creed, religion, disability, national origin or sex”. Minn. Stat. § 363.03(3) (1982).

16. Id.

17. See United States Jaycees v. McClure, 534 F. Supp. 766 (D. Minn. 1982); United States Jaycees v. McClure, 709 F.2d 1560 (8th Cir. 1983).

18. United States Jaycees v. McClure, 709 F.2d at 1566-72.

19. Id. at 1572-76.

20. Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. at 622-28.

21. Id. at 627-28.

22. Id. at 623-26, 628-29.
23. Id. at 628.
24. For criticisms of this part of the Roberts opinion, see David E. Bernstein, Antidiscrimination Laws and the First Amendment, 66 MO. L. REV. 83, 97-98 (2001) (hereinafter, Bernstein, Antidiscrimination); Neal E. Devins, The Trouble with Jaycees, 34 CATH. U. L. REV. 901, 913-14; Douglas O. Linder, Freedom of Association After Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 82 MICH. L. REV. 1878, 1892 (1984).
25. See David E. Bernstein, The Right of Expressive Association and Private Universities Racial Codes, 9 WM. & MARY BILL OF RTS. J. 619, 623 (2001) (hereinafter, Bernstein, Association) (arguing that the Roberts decision sent a message that expressive association rights were not to be taken seriously).
26. Id. at 633-40 (O'Connor, J., concurring).
27. See Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987); N.Y. State Club Ass'n v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1 (1988).
28. Duarte, 481 U.S. at 548. In fact, the Court stated that the admission of women would promote Rotary International's goals of providing humanitarian service, encouraging high ethical standards, and ensuring that Rotary clubs represented a cross-section of their communities. Id. at 548-49.
29. Id. at 549. In all, the Court's entire discussion of both the effect of the admission of women on the ability of the organization to promote its goals and the compelling interest test consists of only three paragraphs. See id. at 548-49.
30. New York State Club Association, 487 U.S. at 13 (quoting Duarte, 481 U.S. at 548). In rejecting the plaintiffs' challenge, the Court did note that "if a club seeks to exclude individuals who do not share the views that the club members wish to promote” different issues would arise, perhaps leading to a different result. Id. at 13.

31. See, e.g., Isbister v. Boys’ Club of Santa Cruz, Inc., 707 P.2d 212 (Cal. 1985); Quinnipiac Council, Boy Scouts of Am. Inc. v. Comm’n on Human Rights & Opportunities, 528 A.2d 352 (Conn. 1987).

32. 515 U.S. 557 (1995).

33. See Id. at 560-61. The public accommodations law prohibited, in pertinent part, “any distinction, discrimination or restriction on account of ... sexual orientation ... relative to the admission of any person to, or treatment in any place of public accommodation, resort or amusement.” Mass.Gen.Laws §272:98 (1992).

34. See Hurley, 515 U.S. at 563.

35. Id. at 563.

36. Id.

37. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston v. Boston, 636 N.E. 2d 1293 (1994). Interestingly, in the interim between the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Court and the United States Supreme Court’s decision, a Massachusetts federal district court issued a declaratory judgment holding that the organizers of the parade had a right to exclude GLIB. S. Boston Allied War Veterans Council v. Boston, 875 F. Supp. 891 (D. Mass. 1995). The federal district court distinguished Roberts and Duarte, finding that the Massachusetts public accommodations statute significantly burdened the organizers right to expressive association, and that even if Massachusetts had a compelling interest in eradicating discrimination, this could not overcome that right. Id. at 915-17.

38. Hurley, 515 U.S. at 572-73.

39. Id. at 573.
40. Id. at 580.
41. Id. at 580-81.
42. Dale, 530 U.S. at 644.
43. Id. at 644-45.
44. Id. at 645.
45. Id.
46. Id. The New Jersey public accommodations law involved prohibited, inter alia, discrimination in privileges of any place of public accommodation due to sexual orientation. N.J. Stat. Ann. § 10:5-4 (West Supp. 2000).
47. Dale, 530 U.S. at 645-46.
48. Dale v. Boy Scouts of Am., 706 A.2d 270 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1998).
49. Id. at 288. As a part of this analysis, the court expressed skepticism regarding whether the BSA's policy against homosexual members was in fact a public position taken by the organization. The court noted that, according to BSA rules and bylaws, the only membership requirements were age, gender, and willingness to adhere to the Scout Law and Scout Oath. The court also noted that, although the BSA had contended that its policy was that the requirements in the Scout Law and Oath that a scout be "morally straight" and "clean" prohibited homosexuality, the policy was of fairly recent vintage and had not been widely disseminated. Id. at 288-89.
50. Id. at 291-92.
51. See id. at 293.
52. Dale v. Boy Scouts of Am., 734 A.2d 1196 (N.J. 1999).
53. Id. at 1225.

54. Id. at 1223 (citing Roberts, 468 U.S. at 628).
55. Id. at 1228.
56. Dale, 530 U.S. at 647-48.
57. Id. at 651.
58. Id. at 651-52.
59. Id. at 651-52.
60. Id. at 654.
61. Id. at 655-56.
62. Id. at 659.
63. See id. at 663-700 (Stevens, J., dissenting); id. at 700-02 (Souter, J., dissenting).
64. See Richard A. Epstein, The Constitutional Perils of Moderation: The Case of the Boy Scouts, 74 S. CAL. L. REV. 119, 120 (2000).
65. Id. at 140.
66. Id. at 139-42. Epstein recognizes that this approach would invalidate much of the Civil Rights Act, including Title VII as it relates to employment. However, he believes that this position would assist voluntary affirmative action, as well as other sex and race-conscious decisions. Id. at 142
67. Andrew Koppelman, Signs of the Times: Dale v. Boy Scouts of American and the Changing Meaning of Non-Discrimination, 23 CARDOZO L. REV. 1819 (2002).
68. Id. at 1821.
69. Id. at 1822.
70. Dale Carpenter, Expressive Association and Anti-Discrimination Law After Dale: A Tripartite Approach, 85 MINN. L. REV. 1515, 1516-17 (2001).

71. Id. at 1571.
72. Id. at 1568. Carpenter notes that content-based restrictions on core political speech are subject to strict scrutiny, while restrictions on commercial speech receive only intermediate scrutiny. Id.
73. Id. at 1570. Carpenter advocates the addition of a category for “quasi-expressive” associations which mix a significant degree of expressive and commercial activity, and would be granted protection consistent with the nature of the internal operation sought to be brought into compliance with the antidiscrimination law. Id. at 1576-77.
74. See Chemerinsky & Fisk, supra note 21, at 616-17; Darren Lenard Hutchinson, “Closet Case”: Boy Scouts of America v. Dale and the Reinforcement of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender Invisibility, 76 TUL. L. REV. 81, 106-20 (2001); Arthur S. Leonard, Boy Scouts of America v. Dale: The “Gay Rights Activist” as Constitutional Pariah, 12 STAN. L. & POL’Y REV. 27, 32 (2001).
75. Chemerinsky & Fisk, supra note 21, at 617.
76. Dale, 530 U.S. at 661
77. White v. Lee, 227 F.3d 1214, 1227 (9th Cir. 2000).
78. 762 N.E.2d 835 (Mass. 2002).
79. 809 A.2d 1192 (D.C. App. 2002).
80. Id. at 1200.
81. Id. at 1200-01. The court similarly refused to credit an attempt by the Commission to show that, unlike the plaintiff in Dale, the two complainants in its case were not “gay activists”. Id. at 1201-03.
82. 229 F.3d 435 (3rd Cir. 2000).

83. Id. at 447.
84. Id. at 443-45.
85. Id. at 444.
86. Id.
87. Id. at 445-47.
88. See Dale, 530 U.S. at 649-50.
89. See, e.g. Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 602 (1983).
90. 494 U.S. 872 (1990).
91. Cf. Ganzy v. Allen Christian Sch., 995 F. Supp. 340, 348 (E.D.N.Y. 1998); Vigars v. Valley Christian Ctr., 805 F. Supp. 802, 808 (N.D. Cal. 1992); Dolter v. Wahlert High Sch., 483 F. Supp. 266, 271 (N.D. Iowa 1980).
92. 533 U.S. 98 (2001).
93. See Bernstein, Association, supra note 9, at 640-41.
94. Transcript of Discussion in GARY LAMARCHE, ED., SPEECH AND EQUALITY: DO WE REALLY HAVE TO CHOOSE? 75 (New York: NYU Press 1996); see also Michael S. Greve, The Libertarian Case for Speech Codes, REASON, July 1995, available at <http://reason.com/9507/GREVEcol.jul.shtml>.
95. Grutter v. Bollinger, 123 S. Ct. 2325 (2003).
96. See Bernstein, Association, supra note 9, at 634.
97. 465 U.S. 555 (1984).
98. Id. at 575-76.
99. See David E. Bernstein, Sex Discrimination Laws Versus Civil Liberties, 1999 U. CHI.

LEGAL F. 133, 152.

bePress Legal Repository