

“Amorphous Federalism” and the Supreme Court’s Marriage Cases *

David B. Cruz **

Abstract

This is a draft of an article forthcoming in the Loyola Law Review Supreme Court issue. It addresses the U.S. Supreme Court’s decisions in Hollingsworth v. Perry and United States v. Windsor, the two cases in the October 2012 term that took up issues of marriage rights of same-sex couples. Part I examines the Supreme Court’s opinion in Perry. It summarizes the litigation; teases out divergent views of the relevance of federalism for the Court’s standing ruling in the case; identifies the problematic constitutional underpinnings of the Perry dissenters’ views of federal court standing, which rely on an unjustified constitutional privileging of initiative lawmaking; and explains why Perry is likely to have but limited impact on the Supreme Court’s Article III standing doctrine. Part II then summarizes the Windsor litigation; defends what should have been the self-evident conclusion—though denied by Justice Scalia in his Windsor dissent—that the Supreme Court’s opinion in Windsor is based on equal protection (even if it perhaps also rests on substantive due process protection of “liberty”) and in so doing unpacks its treatment of federalism—something Justice Scalia derided as “amorphous”—to show how the majority’s treatment of states’ predominant historical role in marriage regulation fits within an evidentiary framework whereby the Court used it to help establish the impropriety of the purpose of the “Defense of Marriage Act”; and explores some potential ramifications of the decision for challenges to state refusals to recognize same-sex couples’ marriages from other states and to state refusals to allow same-sex couples to marry within their territory.

Introduction

On June 26, 2013, one decade to the day since the Supreme Court of the United States decided its landmark gay rights case, Lawrence v. Texas,<sup>1</sup> the Court decided a pair of cases concerning the rights of same-sex couples to civil marriages equal to those of different-sex couples. Hollingsworth v. Perry<sup>2</sup> presented equal protection and substantive due process

---

* Copyright © David B. Cruz 2013. Please do not quote, cite, reproduce, or circulate without permission of the author.

** Professor of Law, University of Southern California Gould School of Law. Special thanks to John Korevec for valuable research assistance.

<sup>1</sup> 539 U.S. 558 (2003) (holding that Texas’s “homosexual conduct” law unconstitutionally deprived the men who challenged the law of liberty in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause).

<sup>2</sup> 133 S.Ct. 2652 (2013).

challenges to California's Proposition 8, which amended the state Constitution to strip same-sex couples of the right to marry that the state supreme court had previously held it guaranteed. United States v. Windsor<sup>3</sup> presented an equal protection challenge to Section 3 of the federal so-called Defense of Marriage Act or "DOMA,"<sup>3</sup> which defines marriage for virtually all of federal law as limited to male-female couples,<sup>4</sup> thus excluding same-sex couples lawfully married under state, Indian tribal, or foreign law.

In Perry,<sup>5</sup> the Governor and Attorney General of California had refused to defend Proposition 8,<sup>6</sup> which was instead defended by the individual sponsors or "proponents" of the initiative. When Proposition 8 was held unconstitutional following a bench trial,<sup>7</sup> the state defendants refused to appeal, leaving the proponents to attempt to do so themselves. When the U.S. Supreme Court granted their petition for a writ of certiorari, it directed the parties not simply to address whether Proposition 8 was unconstitutional but also whether the proponents had standing.<sup>8</sup> After arguments in March 2013, a majority of the Court ruled that the measure's <sup>3</sup> 133 S.Ct. 2675 (2013). Disclosure: I was a member of the Board of Directors during much of and an elected General Counsel for the ACLU throughout the Windsor litigation, and the ACLU represented Edie Windsor in her challenge to DOMA Section 3, although I did not help with that litigation. The views in this article are my own and not necessarily those of the ACLU (or any other organization with which I may be affiliated).

---

<sup>3</sup> Pub. L. No. 104-199, 110 Stat. 2419 (1996) (codified at 1 U.S.C. § 7 and 28 U.S.C. § 1738C (2006)).

<sup>4</sup> Section 3 of DOMA defines "marriage" for most federal law purposes to "mean[ ] only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, and the word 'spouse' [to] refer[ ] only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife." Id. § 3.

<sup>5</sup> I depart here from the convention of referring to cases by the first (non-governmental) party named in the caption to honor Kris Perry, along with her now wife Sandy Stier, and their co-plaintiffs Jeff Zarillo and Paul Katami, also now married, whose bravery (and perhaps incaution) in litigating against California's Proposition 8 led to the Supreme Court decision in Perry clearing the way for same-sex couples to resume marrying in the state. I do not see any need to honor Dennis Hollingsworth, one of the official proponents of Proposition 8 who qualified that odious measure for the ballot and subsequently doggedly tried to ensure its discrimination would continue.

<sup>6</sup> Bob Egelko, Same-Sex Marriage Fuels Debate Over Path to Change, SFGate (Sept. 8, 2013, 5:40 AM), <http://www.sfgate.com/news/article/Same-sex-marriage-fuels-debate-over-path-to-change-4797401.php#page-2>.

<sup>7</sup> Perry v. Schwarzenegger, 704 F. Supp. 2d 921 (N.D. Cal. 2010).

<sup>8</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 786 (2012) ("In addition to the question presented by the petition, the parties are directed to brief and argue the following question: Whether petitioners have standing under Article III, § 2 of the Constitution in this case.").

proponents lacked Article III standing,<sup>9</sup> dismissed the appeal,<sup>10</sup> and ultimately left the district court injunction against Proposition 8 intact,<sup>11</sup> clearing the way for same-sex couples to resume marrying in California.

Windsor also presented standing issues, because after Edie Windsor filed the lawsuit, Attorney General Eric Holder and President Barack Obama concluded that Section 3 of DOMA was unconstitutional and therefore refused to defend it.<sup>12</sup> The House Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group (“BLAG”) then intervened to defend it.<sup>13</sup> Although BLAG lost on summary judgment, where the district judge vindicated the Administration’s position,<sup>14</sup> the Justice Department did not comply with the judgment but instead sought to appeal the case, as did BLAG.<sup>15</sup> The Second Circuit Court of Appeals agreed with the district court that DOMA’s Section 3 was unconstitutional,<sup>16</sup> and DOJ and BLAG sought Supreme Court review. The Supreme Court ruled in Windsor that there was a proper case or controversy before it despite the Administration’s agreement with the plaintiff’s constitutional interpretation<sup>17</sup> (answering a question it had directed the parties to address<sup>18</sup>), and that on the merits Section 3 of DOMA violated the Constitution’s equal protection guarantee as applied to same-sex couples validly married under state law.<sup>19</sup>

---

<sup>9</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013).

<sup>10</sup> Id.

<sup>11</sup> Perry v. Brown, 2013 WL 3991967 (9th Cir. Aug 06, 2013) (No. 10-16696, 11-16577).

<sup>12</sup> Letter from the Attorney General to Congress on Litigation Involving the Defense of Marriage Act (Feb. 23, 2011), <http://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/2011/February/11-ag-223.html>.

<sup>13</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2684 (2013).

<sup>14</sup> Windsor v. United States, 833 F. Supp. 2d 394 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

<sup>15</sup> Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2684.

<sup>16</sup> Windsor v. United States, 699 F.3d 169 (2d Cir. 2012).

<sup>17</sup> Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2686 (“In this case the United States retains a stake sufficient to support Article III jurisdiction on appeal and in proceedings before this Court.”); id. at 2688 (“For these reasons, the prudential and Article III requirements are met here; and, as a consequence, the Court need not decide whether BLAG would have standing to challenge the District Court’s ruling and its affirmance in the Court of Appeals on BLAG’s own authority.”).

<sup>18</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 786 (U.S. Dec 07, 2012) (“In addition to the question presented by the petition, the parties are directed to brief and argue the following questions: Whether the Executive Branch’s agreement with the court below that DOMA is unconstitutional deprives this Court of jurisdiction to decide this case; and whether the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group of the United States House of Representatives has Article III standing in this case.”).

Although Justice Scalia joined the majority in Perry holding that Proposition 8’s sponsors lacked standing to appeal the trial court ruling striking it down, he did not agree with the majority in Windsor. Dissenting from the decision even to reach the merits as well as from the Court’s conclusion that on the merits Section 3 of DOMA was unconstitutional,<sup>20</sup> he had nothing but disdain for the majority opinion.<sup>21</sup> After criticizing much of the majority’s discussion of federalism, he leveled this (no pun intended) blistering indictment at the Windsor majority opinion:

Some might conclude that this loaf [i.e., the opinion] could have used a while longer in the oven. But that would be wrong; it is already overcooked. The most expert care in preparation cannot redeem a bad recipe. The sum of all the Court’s nonspecific hand-waving is that this law is invalid (maybe on equal-protection grounds, maybe on substantive-due-process grounds, and perhaps with some amorphous federalism component playing a role) because it is motivated by a “bare . . . desire to harm” couples in same-sex marriages.<sup>22</sup>

This article takes up Justice Scalia’s concern for the role, allegedly “amorphous,” of federalism in the Windsor opinion. First, though, Part I turns to the Supreme Court’s opinion in Perry. It summarizes the litigation, teases out divergent views of the relevance of federalism for the Court’s standing ruling, identifies the problematic constitutional underpinnings of the Perry dissenters’ view, and touches on the limited impact of Perry for the Supreme Court’s Article III standing doctrine. Then in Part II, the article summarizes the Windsor litigation, defends what

---

<sup>20</sup> See Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2693 (concluding that DOMA Section 3 “violates basic due process and equal protection principles applicable to the Federal Government”). Section II.B infra discusses at length the equal protection grounding of the Supreme Court’s Windsor decision.

<sup>19</sup> See Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2693 (concluding that DOMA Section 3 “violates basic due process and equal protection principles applicable to the Federal Government”). Section II.B infra discusses at length the equal protection grounding of the Supreme Court’s Windsor decision.

<sup>20</sup> See United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (“We have no power to decide this case. And even if we did, we have no power under the Constitution to invalidate this democratically adopted legislation.”).

<sup>21</sup> Rather than close his opinion with the customary “I respectfully dissent,” e.g., id. at 2720 (Alito, J., dissenting), Justice Scalia ended his Windsor dissent with the more blunt “I dissent.” Id. at 2711. Even that was prefaced by the recriminatory assertion that “[w]e owed both [sides in this controversy] better.” Id. See also id. at 2698 (labeling Court’s reasoning as “jaw-dropping”); id. at 2701 (“The majority’s discussion of the requirements of Article III bears no resemblance to our jurisprudence.”); id. at 2705 (“There are many remarkable things about the majority’s merits holding. The first is how rootless and shifting its justifications are.”).

<sup>22</sup> Id. at 2707.

should have been the self-evident conclusion that the Supreme Court’s Windsor opinion is based on equal protection, and unpacks its treatment of federalism. Part II also explores some potential ramifications of the decision for challenges to state refusals to recognize same-sex marriages from other states and to state refusals to allow same-sex couples to marry within their territory.

I. Federalism Concerns in Hollingsworth v. Perry

Although the role of federalism in Hollingsworth v. Perry is more “amorphous” or inchoate than it is in United States v. Windsor, discussed in Part II, the Justices’ opinions in Perry might nonetheless be usefully addressed through a federalism lens. The ideologically mixed Perry dissenters invoke federalism, suggesting the majority disserves federalism by disserving states’ initiative processes.<sup>23</sup> The dissenters’ position presupposes that the initiative mechanism, or at least a state’s freedom to choose it, is something the Constitution values. But as Hans Linde and others have argued, the process is constitutionally quite problematic.<sup>24</sup> So, even if not constitutionally forbidden, we certainly should not see the initiative as constitutionally guaranteed (say in the same way the independence of state legislatures from federal “commandeering” is held to be guaranteed<sup>25</sup>), and so denying federal court standing to initiative sponsors seeking to defend discriminatory measures they sponsored should not be seen as a harm to the constitutional order.

Section A of this Part summarizes the Perry litigation up to and including the Supreme Court level. Section B identifies and analyzes a disagreement among the Justices about what federalism counsels regarding the approach the Court should take toward state initiative processes. Section C recounts some of the constitutional concerns about state initiatives, especially ones like Proposition 8 that target minority populations for unfavorable treatment, which undermine the dissent’s view on this issue. Section D then explains why the Court’s Article III standing holding is likely to have but minor effects on the cases that can come before the federal courts. Perry thus may be ultimately more significant for the large numbers of people it allows to be married than for its doctrinal holding.

A. The Perry Litigation

In May of 2008, the California Supreme Court ruled in In re Marriage Cases<sup>26</sup> that the state constitution’s equal protection guarantee and fundamental right to marry required that the exclusion of same-sex couples be subjected to strict scrutiny, and that the exclusion failed that scrutiny and was unconstitutional. From June 2008 through November 4, 2008, an estimated

---

<sup>23</sup> The majority opinion by Chief Justice Roberts perhaps could be read to say we serve federalism by keeping federal courts out of disputes lacking properly aggrieved parties.

<sup>24</sup> See infra Part I.C.

<sup>25</sup> Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

<sup>26</sup> 183 P.3d 384 (Cal. 2008).

18,000 same-sex couples were married in the state. On November 4, 2008, election day, the voters of the state were asked to approve Proposition 8, an initiative that would amend the California Constitution to strip away same-sex couples' right to marry. And the voters did so, approximately 52% to 48%.<sup>27</sup>

The next day, a number of persons filed suit in state court,<sup>28</sup> arguing that Proposition 8 was impermissibly adopted via the initiative process because it was not a mere "amendment" to the state constitution, but a more profound "revision," requiring approval by the legislature.<sup>29</sup> Proposition 8's proponents or official sponsors defended their measure in court because the Governor thought the state supreme court should invalidate it<sup>30</sup> and the Attorney General affirmatively argued that it was unconstitutional.<sup>31</sup> After oral arguments in which former U.S. Solicitor General Kenneth Starr argued for the measure's defenders, the California Supreme Court rejected the revision argument and upheld Prop 8.<sup>32</sup> Justice Carlos Moreno was the sole dissenter.<sup>33</sup>

Four days before the California Supreme Court rejected that last state-law challenge to Proposition 8,<sup>34</sup> two same-sex couples, Kris Perry and Sandy Stier, and Paul Katami and Jeff Zarillo, filed suit in federal court.<sup>35</sup> The plaintiffs were represented by the political odd couple of

---

<sup>27</sup> David B. Cruz, Californians Enshrine Discrimination in Constitution, Cruzlines.org (Nov. 5, 2008), <http://cruz-lines.blogspot.com/2008/11/californians-enshrine-discrimination-in.html>.

<sup>28</sup> Strauss v. Horton, 207 P.3d 48, 65-66 (Cal. 2009).

<sup>29</sup> Id. at 60, 68, 88.

<sup>30</sup> Maura Dolan, Justices Will Hear Prop. 8 Challenges: State Supreme Court Agrees to Take Up the Lawsuits Next Spring but Refuses to Stay a Ban on Same-Sex Marriages, L.A. Times, at 1 (Nov. 20, 2008), available at 2008 WLNR 22136606.

<sup>31</sup> Id. at 63, 116 (presenting the Attorney General's argument that state constitutional amendments that abrogate fundamental rights must pass a "compelling interest" test that Proposition 8 fails).

<sup>32</sup> David Edwards & Stephen P. Webster, Arguing for Prop. 8, Ken Starr says any right can be taken, http://rawstory.com/news/2008/Ken\_Starr\_argues\_for\_Prop\_8\_0305.html (Mar. 5, 2009); Strauss v. Horton, , 207 P.3d 48 (Cal. 2009)

<sup>33</sup> David B. Cruz, Equality's Centrality: Proposition 8 and the California Constitution, 19 S. Cal. Rev. L. & Soc. Justice 45 (2010) (recounting the background to the Proposition 8 litigation through the California Supreme Court decision rejecting the revision argument).

<sup>34</sup> See Strauss v. Horton, at <http://www.courts.ca.gov/documents/S168047.pdf> (filed May 26, 2009).

<sup>35</sup> Perry v. Schwarzenegger, CV 09-2292 (N.D. Cal. filed May 22, 2009), at http://www.oyez.org/ssm/documents/prop8\_trial\_complaint.pdf.

David Boies and Ted Olsen, the attorneys who had represented rival presidential candidates before the Supreme Court in Bush v. Gore in 2000.<sup>36</sup> They argued that Prop 8 violated same-sex couples' federal constitutional right to equal protection and fundamental right to marry.<sup>37</sup> Boies and Olsen were hoping to fast-track the litigation up to the U.S. Supreme Court,<sup>38</sup> but Chief Judge Vaughn Walker of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California insisted that the parties have a full trial.<sup>39</sup>

The parties included the City and County of San Francisco, which intervened as a plaintiff challenging Prop 8, as well as the initiative's proponents, the private individuals who had qualified the measure for the ballot.<sup>40</sup> The proponents intervened as defendants seeking to uphold the law at least in part because the Governor and Attorney General of California were not going to defend Prop 8 in this litigation either.<sup>41</sup> At the close of a trial in which the plaintiffs' witnesses dramatically outnumbered<sup>42</sup> and were more credible than the defense's two witnesses,

---

<sup>36</sup> Ross Todd, Marriage Brokers, American Lawyer (Mar. 2011), at <http://www.gibsondunn.com/news/Documents/GibsonDunnMarriageBrokers-AmLaw-3-11.pdf>, at *2.

<sup>37</sup> Perry v. Schwarzenegger, 704 F. Supp. 2d 921, 929-30 (N.D. Cal. 2010).

<sup>38</sup> See, e.g., Prop 8 on Trial, <http://www.eqca.org/site/pp.asp?b=5716101&c=kuLRJ9MRKrH> (noting for July 2009 that "Counsel for plaintiffs and the intervenor-defendants (Prop 8's proponents) say the case instead should be resolved quickly in the district court based on legal briefs without evidentiary findings [rather than have a factual trial]."); Margaret Talbot, Closing Time, The New Yorker, June 16, 2010, <http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/newsdesk/2010/06/closing-time.html> (noting during Perry trial that "Boies and Olson hope the Perry case will be appealed all the way up to the Supreme Court"); Ross Todd, Marriage Brokers, American Lawyer (Mar. 2011), at <http://www.gibsondunn.com/news/Documents/GibsonDunnMarriageBrokers-AmLaw-3-11.pdf>, at *4 ("When Boies and Olson filed suit in San Francisco federal district court on May 22, 2009, they thought a ruling on their motion for preliminary injunction would create grounds for a quick appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. Neither expected the case to go to trial.").

<sup>39</sup> Scott Shafer, Prop 8 Judge Vaughn Walker: Courts' Change on Same-Sex Marriage Was 'Utterly Unimaginable.' <http://blogs.kqed.org/newsfix/2013/06/11/vaughn-walker> (June 12, 2013) (noting that "Walker ch[o]se to hold a trial with witnesses, rather than just take briefs and make a ruling").

<sup>40</sup> See Perry, 704 F. Supp. 2d at 928-29.

<sup>41</sup> See id. at 928.

<sup>42</sup> Maura Dolan, Prop. 8 judge probes 'choice.' L.A. Times 1 (June 15, 2010), available at 2010 WLNR 12144730 ("Opponents of Proposition 8 called 16 witnesses and supporters two.").

Judge Walker held that Prop 8 was unconstitutional, violating same-sex couples' rights under the Equal Protection Clause and fundamental right to marry of the U.S. Constitution.<sup>43</sup>

The state defendants declined to appeal, but the proponents of Prop 8 sought to, though it was unclear to various observers (and the plaintiffs challenging Prop 8) whether they had standing under Article III of the U.S. Constitution to do so.<sup>44</sup> Because the standing issue was also unclear to the Court of Appeals, that court certified a question to the California Supreme Court as to the proponents' authority to defend Prop 8 under state law.<sup>45</sup> Eventually, the state supreme court held that state law authorized the proponents to assert the state's interests and file appeals in defense of Prop 8 when the state defendants refused to do so.<sup>46</sup> The U.S. Court of Appeals subsequently held that this was good enough to give the proponents standing in federal court, but that Prop 8 was unconstitutional, although on California-specific grounds narrower than Judge Walker's ruling relied on.<sup>47</sup>

The proponents then asked the U.S. Supreme Court to review that decision, and the Court agreed, on the same day it agreed to hear United States v. Windsor.<sup>48</sup> In granting review in Perry, the Supreme Court also provided that "[i]n addition to the question presented by the petition, the <sup>43</sup> Perry, 704 F. Supp. 2d at 940 ("[T]he court finds that each of plaintiffs' proffered experts offered credible opinion testimony on the subjects identified."); id. at 946-47 ("The court now determines that [proponents' proffered expert David] Blankenhorn's testimony constitutes inadmissible opinion testimony that should be given essentially no weight. ... None of Blankenhorn's opinions is reliable."); id. at 950 ("Blankenhorn's opinions are not supported by reliable evidence or methodology and Blankenhorn failed to consider evidence contrary to his view in presenting his testimony. The court therefore finds the opinions of Blankenhorn to be unreliable and entitled to essentially no weight."); id. at 952 ("[T]he court finds that [proponents' proffered expert Kenneth P.] Miller's opinions on gay and lesbian political power are entitled to little weight and only to the extent they are amply supported by reliable evidence.").

---

<sup>44</sup> See, e.g., David B. Cruz, Do the Prop 8 Proponents Have Standing to Appeal?, CruzLines.org (Aug. 13, 2010), <http://cruz-lines.blogspot.com/2010/08/do-prop-8-proponents-have-standing-to.html>.

<sup>45</sup> See David B. Cruz, California Supreme Court to Hear Prop 8 Case, Again, CruzLines.org (Feb. 16, 2011), <http://cruz-lines.blogspot.com/2011/02/california-supreme-court-to-hear-prop-8.html>.

<sup>46</sup> Cruz, infra.

<sup>47</sup> Perry v. Brown, 671 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2012).

<sup>48</sup> David B. Cruz, Supreme Court to Hear Challenges to Prop 8 and DOMA Section 3, CruzLines.org (Dec. 7, 2012), <http://cruz-lines.blogspot.com/2012/12/supreme-court-to-hear-challenges-to.html>

parties are directed to brief and argue the following question: Whether petitioners have standing under Article III, § 2 of the Constitution in this case.”<sup>49</sup> The Court heard arguments in March 2013, and three months later by a five-to-four vote it dismissed the proponents’ appeal, vacated the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and remanded the case to that court with instruction to dismiss the proponents’ appeal from the trial court ruling invalidating Proposition 8.<sup>50</sup>

The primary problems for the Supreme Court majority were that the proponents had no concrete personal injury from the decision holding Prop 8 unconstitutional and enjoining its enforcement, and that they were not state officials who might properly assert the state’s interests in defense of the law in federal court.<sup>51</sup> The Court has for decades interpreted Article III of the Constitution to impose certain requirements for someone to have standing to invoke the federal judicial power.<sup>52</sup> Among those is the requirement that a plaintiff or appellant have suffered a personal injury that is concrete and particularized, not an abstract ideological grievance.<sup>53</sup> The couples who filed suit in federal court to challenge Prop 8 had such an injury, as the measure compelled the state to deny them marriage licenses and all the rights that would have accompanied being married.<sup>54</sup> But when the trial court ruled in their favor and entered a permanent injunction, the proponents of the measure were not comparably harmed. They strongly favored the law they had championed, believed it constitutional, and wished to see it enforced.<sup>55</sup> But those are ideological concerns, not Article III injuries.

The proponents’ only alternative route to standing would have been to themselves in the mantle of the state’s authority. The litigants on both sides did not doubt that a state has Article III standing to defend its laws and is sufficiently injured by federal court rulings holding them unconstitutional that it could appeal in federal court.<sup>56</sup> The problem for the Supreme Court in Perry, however, was that it did not view the proponents as the state or agents of the state or the people of the state.<sup>57</sup> The proponents,<sup>58</sup> like the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals,<sup>59</sup> had relied on

---

<sup>49</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 786 (2012).

<sup>50</sup> 133 S.Ct. 2675 (2013).

<sup>51</sup> Id.

<sup>52</sup> See, e.g., Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 US 555, 560-61 (1992)

<sup>53</sup> See, e.g., id. at 560, 573-77.

<sup>54</sup> Perry v. Schwarzenegger, 704 F. Supp. 2d 921 (N.D. Cal. 2010).

<sup>55</sup> Perry v. Brown, 671 F.3d 1052, 1064 (9th Cir. 2012).

<sup>56</sup> Brief of Petitioners, Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013) (No. 12-144), 2013 WL 457384. and respondents’ SCOTUS brief.

<sup>57</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652, 2666 (2013).

the California Supreme Court decision<sup>60</sup> holding that California law authorized initiative sponsors in their position to assert the state’s interests in defense of their initiative and to take appeals from decisions ruling it unconstitutional. For the Justices in the majority on the Supreme Court, however, this was insufficient. In the majority’s eyes, the proponents “hold no office and have always participated in this litigation solely as private parties.”<sup>61</sup> Besides holding no office, the proponents lacked “the most basic features of an agency relationship.”<sup>62</sup> The proponents “answer to no one; they decide for themselves, with no review, what arguments to make and how to make them. Unlike California’s attorney general, they are not elected at regular intervals—or elected at all. No provision provides for their removal.”<sup>63</sup>

B. The Justices’ Disparate Views of Federalism: State Law and Federal Standing

Chief Justice Roberts’s majority opinion opened with recognition that the underlying substantive issue in the case is currently subject to political contestation: “The public is currently engaged in an active political debate over whether same-sex couples should be allowed to marry.”<sup>64</sup> From a federalism perspective, this might counsel in favor of allowing federal appellate courts to reverse the trial court decision and so sanction California’s adoption of Proposition 8. Instead, separation of powers trumped, and the Court held that Proposition 8’s sponsors lacked Article III standing to appeal in order to litigate its constitutionality: “Federal courts have authority under the Constitution to answer such questions only if necessary to do so in the course of deciding an actual ‘case’ or ‘controversy.’”<sup>65</sup> The Court characterized the policymaking concern behind its standing doctrine in terms of separation of powers: “It ensures that we act as judges, and do not engage in policymaking properly left to elected representatives.”<sup>66</sup> But this policymaking concern could also be thought of in terms of

---

<sup>58</sup> Brief of Petitioners, at *12, *15–16 Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013) (No. 12-144), 2013 WL 457384.

<sup>59</sup> Perry v. Brown, 671 F.3d 1052, 1064 (9th Cir. 2012).

<sup>60</sup> Perry v. Brown, 265 P.3d 1002, 1006–07 (Cal. 2011).

<sup>61</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652, 2665 (2013).

<sup>62</sup> Id. at 2666.

<sup>63</sup> Id. at 2666–67 (citations omitted).

<sup>64</sup> Id. at 2659.

<sup>65</sup> Id.

<sup>66</sup> Id.

federalism; after all, the “elected representatives” who are largely responsible for regulating marriage in our constitutional order are state legislators, not members of Congress.<sup>67</sup>

The Perry majority recounted the Ninth Circuit’s standing analysis, which relied on the answer the California Supreme Court gave to the question the Ninth Circuit panel certified to it regarding the proponents’ authority under state law.<sup>68</sup> California, the Court reasoned, “has standing to defend the constitutionality of its [laws],” and States have the “prerogative, as independent sovereigns, to decide for themselves who may assert their interests.”<sup>69</sup> The Ninth Circuit had thought that “[a]ll a federal court need determine is that the state has suffered a harm sufficient to confer standing and that the party seeking to invoke the jurisdiction of the court is authorized by the state to represent its interest in remedying that harm.”<sup>70</sup> But the majority in Perry rejected the view that a state is free to authorize whomever it wants to represent its interests and thereby create federal standing.<sup>71</sup>

To repeat, the Court spoke of standing in separation of powers terms: “The doctrine of standing, we recently explained, ‘serves to prevent the judicial process from being used to usurp the powers of the political branches.’”<sup>72</sup> The Court referred to “this ‘overriding and time-honored concern about keeping the Judiciary’s power within its proper constitutional sphere . . . .”<sup>73</sup> But

---

<sup>67</sup> Of course, such reasoning would not be expressly supported by current standing doctrine, where the Court has said that the standing limitation derived from Article III “is built on a single basic idea—the idea of separation of powers.” Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 752 (1984).

The statement in the main text is of course a bit of an oversimplification. Congress could exercise its plenary power over the District of Columbia, see U.S. Const. art. I, §8, cl. 17, to prescribe eligibility criteria for marriage within the District. Indian tribes also prescribe eligibility criteria for marriages, and some tribes have allowed same-sex couples to marry. See, e.g., David B. Cruz, Getting Sex “Right”: Heteronormativity and Biologism in Trans and Intersex Marriage Litigation and Scholarship, 18 Duke J. Gender L. & Pol’y 203, 203-04 n.1 (2010) (Coquille Tribe); Steven Gardner, Suquamish Tribe Approves Same-Sex Marriage, Kitsap Sun (Aug. 1, 2011), <http://www.kitsapsun.com/news/2011/aug/01/suquamish-tribe-approves-same-sex-marriage/>.

<sup>68</sup> Perry, 133 S. Ct. at 2660.

<sup>69</sup> Id. (quoting Perry v. Brown, 671 F. 3d 1052, 1070, 1071 (2012) (quoting Diamond v. Charles, 476 U. S. 54, 62 (1986))).

<sup>70</sup> Id. at 2664 (quoting Perry v. Brown, 671 F.3d at 1072).

<sup>71</sup> Id. at 2667.

<sup>72</sup> Id. (quoting Clapper v. Amnesty Int’l USA, 133 S. Ct. 1138, 1146 (2013)).

<sup>73</sup> Id. (quoting Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 820 (1997)).

a federal court's, even the Supreme Court's, "proper constitutional sphere" respects both horizontal separation of powers and vertical separation, or federalism.

The Court recognized that California law, constitutional and statutory, gave the proponents "a "unique," "special," and "distinct" role in the initiative process" — "but only when it comes to the process of enacting the law."<sup>74</sup> Under the California Supreme Court's authoritative construction of state law, the proponents had "no role—special or otherwise—in the enforcement of Proposition 8."<sup>75</sup> This meant that they had no "personal stake" in defending Prop 8's enforcement that was not shared by California voters at large, and their complaint that the lower federal courts had enjoined Prop 8 was therefore a mere generalized grievance insufficient to confer federal standing,<sup>76</sup> even though the state was content to have the proponents represent its interests.

The majority agreed that "a State must be able to designate agents to represent it in federal court," and that "state law may provide for [certain] officials to speak for the State in federal court."<sup>77</sup> Yet the Supreme Court refused to view the Proponents of Proposition 8 as "agents of the people" of California.<sup>78</sup> The majority opinion in Perry did not see the Proponents as substantive or formal agents of the state.<sup>79</sup> The California Supreme Court did not describe the proponents as agents.<sup>80</sup> Moreover, the proponents answer to no one; they decide for themselves, with no review, what arguments to make and how to make them.<sup>81</sup> Unlike California's attorney general, they are not elected at regular intervals—or elected at all.<sup>82</sup> No provision provides for their removal.<sup>83</sup> As one amicus explained, "the proponents apparently have an unelected

---

<sup>74</sup> Id. at 2662 (quoting Reply Brief at 5 (quoting Perry v. Brown, 52 Cal. 4th 1116, 1126, 1142, 1160 (2011))).

<sup>75</sup> Id. at 2663.

<sup>76</sup> Id. at 2663.

<sup>77</sup> Id. at 2664 (emphasis added).

<sup>78</sup> Id. at 2666.

<sup>79</sup> Cf. Erwin Chemerinsky, Op-Ed, Prop. 8 Deserved a Defense, L.A. Times, June 28, 2013, <http://articles.latimes.com/2013/jun/28/opinion/la-oe-chemerinsky-proposition-8-initiatives-20130628> (agreeing that the proponents of Prop. 8 lacked standing and suggesting that states appoint a special state attorney when other officials refuse to defend an initiative).

<sup>80</sup> Perry, 133 S. Ct. at 2666.

<sup>81</sup> Id.

<sup>82</sup> Id.

<sup>83</sup> Id. at 2667.

appointment for an unspecified period of time as defenders of the initiative, however and to whatever extent they choose to defend it.”<sup>84</sup> The proponents, who never took any oath of office, had no fiduciary obligation to the people of California.<sup>85</sup> This was not purely a formalistic distinction devoid of potential consequence; as the majority in Perry explained, the proponents were accordingly “free to pursue a purely ideological commitment to the law’s constitutionality without the need to take cognizance of resource constraints, changes in public opinion, or potential ramifications for other state priorities.”<sup>86</sup> Their litigation decisions and arguments thus might differ from those of someone facing more constraints.

The majority Justices rejected the dissent’s suggestion that by denying federal standing to the proponents of Prop 8 they were “disrespecting” or “disparaging” the reasons the California Supreme Court authoritatively construed state law to give the proponents authority to defend the proposition.<sup>87</sup> The majority was at pains not to “question California’s sovereign right to maintain an initiative process, or the right of initiative proponents to defend their initiatives in California courts, where Article III does not apply.”<sup>88</sup> But “no matter its reasons, the fact that a State thinks a private party should have standing to seek relief for a generalized grievance cannot override our settled law to the contrary.”<sup>89</sup> In conclusion, Chief Justice Roberts wrote “[w]e have never before upheld the standing of a private party to defend the constitutionality of a state statute when state officials have chosen not to. We decline to do so for the first time here.”<sup>90</sup>

As just suggested, the Perry dissenters, including both conservative and more liberal Justices,<sup>91</sup> saw things very differently from the majority. After opening by lavishing unwarranted praise on the California Supreme Court opinion responding to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals,<sup>92</sup> the dissent charges that the majority opinion’s “reasoning does not take into account

---

<sup>84</sup> Id. at 2667 (quoting Brief for Walter Dellinger as Amicus Curiae in Support of Respondents at 23, Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013) (No. 12-144)).

<sup>85</sup> Id.

<sup>86</sup> Id.

<sup>87</sup> Id.

<sup>88</sup> Id.

<sup>89</sup> Id.

<sup>90</sup> Id. at 2668.

<sup>91</sup> Justice Kennedy authored the dissent in Perry and was joined by Justices Thomas, Alito, and Sotomayor. Id. (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

<sup>92</sup> Id. (asserting that the “state-law issues have been addressed in a meticulous and unanimous opinion by the Supreme Court of California.”). I described many of that opinion’s shortcomings on my blog. See David B. Cruz, CA Supreme Court’s Disappointing Standing Decision, the fundamental principles or the practical dynamics of the initiative system in California.”<sup>93</sup> And the dissenters worried not only about California but also about the majority opinion’s “implications for the 26 other States that use an initiative or popular referendum system and which, like California, may choose to have initiative proponents stand in for the State when public officials decline to defend an initiative in litigation.”<sup>94</sup>

The Perry dissenters complained that “[t]here is no basis for this Court to set aside the California Supreme Court’s determination of state law.”<sup>95</sup> But that phrasing implies that the majority told California its law was different from what its state supreme court had held. But the Perry majority did nothing of the sort. Rather, the U.S. Supreme Court held that, even assuming California law is as the state high court ruled, that is insufficient to satisfy the standing requirements the Court has interpreted Article III to impose.<sup>96</sup>

If this language about “setting aside” an authoritative state law interpretation is dismissed as merely infelicitous, the dissent’s core complaint is that the Perry majority wrongly refused to interpret Article III to allow a state to do what the majority took California to have attempted here – to grant certain private parties the state’s authority to defend a law (even in federal court) but not the authority to enforce it. To prevent elected officials such as the Governor and the Attorney General of a state like California from having a “de facto veto” over state law adopted through the initiative process,<sup>97</sup> the dissenters believed that “California finds it necessary to vest the responsibility and right to defend a voter-approved initiative in the initiative’s proponents when the State Executive declines to do so.”<sup>98</sup> In the dissenters’ view, the majority’s refusal “to allow a State’s authorized representatives to defend the outcome of a democratic election,”<sup>99</sup> here

---

CruzLines.org, (Nov. 17, 2011, 11:55 PM), <http://cruz-lines.blogspot.com/2011/11/ca-supreme-courts-disappointing.html> (concluding that the state Supreme Court “does not even pretend to try to parse the meaning of the provisions of law on which it claims it is basing its decision.”).

<sup>93</sup> Perry, 133 S. Ct. at 2668 (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

<sup>94</sup> Id.

<sup>95</sup> Id., at 2670.

<sup>96</sup> Id., at 2667 (majority opinion) (“[S]tanding in a federal court is a question of federal law, not state law. And no matter its reasons, the fact that a State thinks a private party should have standing to seek relief for a generalized grievance cannot override our settled law to the contrary.”).

<sup>97</sup> Cruz, supra note 67 (explaining why it is incorrect, at least in the posture of cases such as Perry, to believe that “veto” or “nullification” of Proposition 8 was really at issue).

<sup>98</sup> Perry, 133 S. Ct. at 2671 (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

<sup>99</sup> Id. at 2674.

Prop 8, “disrespects and disparages both the political process in California and the well-stated opinion of the California Supreme Court in this case.”<sup>100</sup>

The dissenters believed the majority did not interpret Article III to allow states appropriate latitude to structure an initiative process that maximizes the people’s ability to get what they want regardless of what elected representatives might conclude about the constitutionality of such desires.<sup>101</sup> They believe that through California’s choice (discerned or imposed by the state supreme court<sup>102</sup>) to let private sponsors of initiatives defend their measures in court, the state “defines itself as a sovereign.”<sup>103</sup> Article III ought therefore to be interpreted to allow states such choices. And it is thus this vision of federalism that animates the dissenters in Perry.<sup>104</sup> Thus, for them, “Article III does not require California, when deciding who may appear

---

<sup>100</sup> Id.

<sup>101</sup> See, e.g., id. at 2675 (“In the end, what the Court fails to grasp or accept is the basic premise of the initiative process. And it is this. The essence of democracy is that the right to make law rests in the people and flows to the government, not the other way around. Freedom resides first in the people without need of a grant from the government.”).

<sup>102</sup> See Cruz, CA Supreme Court’s Disappointing Standing Decision, supra (concluding that “the [state supreme] court is not interpreting but clearly adding to the words of the state constitution and the Election Code.”).

<sup>103</sup> Perry, 133 S. Ct. at 2675 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>104</sup> See also, e.g., id. (“In California and the 26 other States that permit initiatives and popular referendums, the people have exercised their own inherent sovereign right to govern themselves. The Court today frustrates that choice ....”); id. at 2668 (insisting that “the State Supreme Court’s definition of proponents’ powers is binding on this Court”); id. at 2669 (“It is for California, not this Court, to determine whether and to what extent the Elections Code provisions are instructive and relevant in determining the authority of proponents to assert the State’s interest in postenactment judicial proceedings. And it is likewise not for this Court to say that a State must determine the substance and meaning of its laws by statute, or by judicial decision, or by a combination of the two. That, too, is for the State to decide.”) (citation omitted). Although the dissent charges that the majority “fails to abide by precedent and misapplies basic principles of justiciability,” id., even some people who believe that initiative sponsors ought to have standing have nonetheless concluded that they do not given current California law and Article III standing doctrine. See, e.g., Erwin Chemerinsky, Prop 8 Deserved a Defense, L.A. Times, June 28, 2013, available at <http://articles.latimes.com/2013/jun/28/opinion/la-oe-chemerinsky-proposition-8-initiatives-20130628> (last visited Aug. 18, 2013) (“The Supreme Court’s decision to dismiss a challenge to Proposition 8 on Wednesday followed well-established law with regard to standing in federal court.”).

in court to defend an initiative on its behalf, to comply with ... this Court's view of how a State should make its laws or structure its government."<sup>105</sup>

Of course, the majority does not say that Article III or anything else in the Constitution tells a state that it may not choose to vest proponents of initiative measures with authorization. It simply says that, if a state so chooses, that choice does not without more entitle those proponents to invoke the jurisdiction of the federal courts to defend such measures against constitutional challenge. The majority and dissenting Justices' disagreement over whether this holding is proper depends significantly on their apparent disagreement over the federalism dictated by the Constitution, and the place of initiative measures in that scheme of federalism.

C. The Constitutional Problematics of Direct Democracy and Proposition 8

If the Constitution guaranteed states the prerogative to adopt initiative and referendum lawmaking, and if federal court standing for the sponsors of such measures to defend them, including by appealing adverse trial court rulings when elected officials refuse to do so, were necessary to make such lawmaking effective, then the Perry dissenters would have a more powerful argument that the majority's denial of standing disserved "Our Federalism."<sup>106</sup> If those preconditions were met, then the majority's ruling arguably would have deprived states of the constitutionally protected power to empower initiative sponsors to appeal federal court rulings holding their measures unconstitutional. Yet each of these argumentative preconditions is deeply questionable.

I have previously detailed reasons that California's initiative power should not be understood to have been vitiated by the denial of Article III standing for sponsors to defend their initiatives.<sup>107</sup> Briefly: As the same-sex couple plaintiffs in Perry noted and the California Supreme Court conceded, "invalidation of Proposition 8 in the underlying federal litigation did not result from any action or inaction by the Governor or Attorney General but from a decision by the federal district court after a contested trial."<sup>108</sup> Clearly "there is no risk of 'effective nullification'" in state courts<sup>109</sup> where California can allow proposition sponsors standing to defend. And in federal court, a case would only be litigated if the plaintiffs have an adequate injury for standing, in which case the proponents of the measure would not need to have standing on their own to intervene as defendants, so the measure would receive "a 'competent and spirited

---

<sup>105</sup> Perry, 133 S. Ct. at 2668 (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

<sup>106</sup> See generally, Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 44 (1971) (discussing the origins of the term "Our Federalism," and how this term conceptualizes a national government that will act "in ways that will not unduly interfere with the legitimate activities of the States").

<sup>107</sup> See generally Cruz, supra note 67 (arguing that a proponent's lack of standing in federal court will not undermine California's initiative process).

<sup>108</sup> Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>109</sup> Id.

defense,’ and a federal judicial decision invalidating the measure therefore cannot be pejoratively labeled a state officer ‘nullification.’”<sup>110</sup> It is therefore unlikely that federal standing to appeal is necessary such that one precondition of the Perry dissenters’ reasoning is satisfied.

It is also doubtful that the Constitution guarantees states the prerogative to adopt initiative and referendum lawmaking, at least in the context of a measure targeting lesbian, gay, and transgender people for unfavorable treatment.<sup>111</sup> As former state supreme court justice Hans Linde argued two decades ago,<sup>112</sup> such measures may well violate the Guaranty Clause of the U.S. Constitution, which provides that “[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government.”<sup>113</sup> Republican government in the states was distinguished by the Clause’s drafters from direct democracy.<sup>114</sup> And certain usages of direct democracy are problematic for the same kinds of reasons that motivated the Guaranty Clause’s framers. “A statewide initiative may be a legitimate process for enacting a gross receipts tax and not for raising social barriers between groups of citizens.”<sup>115</sup> Linde’s study of the founding generation’s understanding of republicanism led him to conclude that it “depended on deliberation by representative institutions not only for rational public policies; it also was the essential safeguard of civil and religious rights.”<sup>116</sup>

Capture of state power by religious majorities to impose their standards on dissidents was a particular fear of that generation,<sup>117</sup> and so, Linde argues, a core concern of the Guaranty Clause. Where moral group passions animate public policy and invite a state’s “citizens to choose sides between the righteous and the sinners, between the homosexual minority and the heterosexual majority,”<sup>118</sup> republican government has failed. For “the design of republican government, embodied in the Constitution eighty years before the Fourteenth Amendment,

---

<sup>110</sup> Id.

<sup>111</sup> See David B. Cruz, Repealing Rights: Proposition 8, Perry, and Crawford Contextualized, 37 N.Y.U. Rev. L. & Soc. Change 235, 241 (2013) (defending conclusion that “Prop 8 takes the right to marry the person of one’s choice away from lesbian, gay, and bisexual persons but not from heterosexually identified persons”).

<sup>112</sup> Hans A. Linde, When Initiative Lawmaking Is Not “Republican Government”: The Campaign Against Homosexuality, 72 Or. L. Rev. 19 (1993).

<sup>113</sup> U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

<sup>114</sup> Linde, supra note 87, at 22.

<sup>115</sup> Id. at 31.

<sup>116</sup> Id. at 33.

<sup>117</sup> See id. at 35.

<sup>118</sup> Id. at 36.

would not allow such policies to be put to a statewide plebiscite upon initiative petitions that bypass deliberation by elected legislators and governors (and, when amending the state constitution, by the courts). Rather, such deliberations were the only guarantee safeguarding minorities against unmediated swings of majority passions ....”<sup>119</sup>

Linde was writing in the context of Oregon’s proposed Measure 9, which lumped “homosexuality” together with “pedophilia, sadism [and] masochism”; prohibited the state from legislating against sexual orientation discrimination or otherwise “recogniz[ing]” the category “homosexuality”; forbade the government to “promote, encourage, or facilitate homosexuality, pedophilia, sadism or masochism”; and directed public schools in particular to “assist in setting a standard for Oregon’s youth that recognizes homosexuality, pedophilia, sadism and masochism as abnormal, wrong, unnatural, and perverse and that these behaviors are to be discouraged and avoided.”<sup>120</sup> Yet California’s Proposition 8, though less inflammatory in tone, raises very similar structural concerns.

Prop 8 reflects a social “dividing practice,”<sup>121</sup> discriminates with respect to an important societal institution, and selectively overrides the state’s equality and fundamental rights guarantees, all without having been tempered by the representative legislative process. Prop 8 seeks to draw a stark line between same-sex couples and the people in them, and different sex couples, and thus largely between lesbigay and heterosexually identified persons, with the latter treated as more valuable or significant.<sup>122</sup> This dividing practice is a prime example of the kind of factionalism Linde was addressing. Prop 8 discriminates with respect to marriage, which is a distinctively important societal institution.<sup>123</sup> This heightens the harm the measure wrought,

---

<sup>119</sup> Id. at 37.

<sup>120</sup> Id. at 36 n.71.

<sup>121</sup> For a brief discussion of the provenance and significance of “dividing practices,” see David B. Cruz, Disestablishing Sex and Gender, 90 Cal. L. Rev. 997, 1003 n.30 (2002).

<sup>122</sup> Michael Dorf has explained why exclusionary marriage laws such as California’s Proposition 8 are reasonably regarded as expressing a second-class status for lesbigay persons. See generally Michael C. Dorf, Same-Sex Marriage, Second-Class Citizenship, and Law’s Social Meanings, 97 Va. L. Rev. 1267 (2011).

<sup>123</sup> See, e.g., United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2692 (2013) (recognizing “the understanding that marriage is more than a routine classification for purposes of certain statutory benefits”); id. at 2710 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (characterizing marriage as “an institution so central to the lives of so many”); id. at 2715 (Alito, J., dissenting) (characterizing “[t]he family” as “an ancient and universal human institution”); id. at 2720 (speculating that Congress “viewed marriage as a valuable institution to be fostered and ... viewed married couples as comprising a unique type of economic unit that merits special regulatory treatment”); cf. In re Marriage Cases, 183 P.3d 384, 399 (2008) (concluding that “the substantive right of two adults who share a loving relationship to join together to establish an officially recognized family of their own — and, if the couple chooses, to raise children within that family — constitutes a vitally important harms which were never addressed and assessed through legislative deliberation because Prop 8 was proposed via the initiative process. Prop 8 also sought to override the California Supreme Court's determinations that "all adult Californians enjoy a fundamental right to marry the person of their choice" and that "that sexual orientation is a suspect classification under the California Constitution, such that government action discriminating on the basis of sexual orientation, including the exclusion of same-sex couples from civil marriage, is likewise subject to strict scrutiny"<sup>124</sup> by "requiring discrimination against a group defined by a suspect classification with respect to a fundamental right, thus violating the foundational guarantee of equal citizenship in the California Constitution."<sup>125</sup> The rampant, unfiltered factionalism at work in Prop 8 thus selectively stripped away some of the most fundamental guarantees of fairness previously offered by the California Constitution. This too shows that Linde's concerns about Oregon's Measure 9 are raised as well by California's Proposition 8.

Consequently, states may not ever have the option, let alone a constitutionally protected prerogative, to adopt a measure such as Proposition 8 via an initiative process, bypassing the legislature, nor should the Constitution be thought to place value on a state's doing so. Direct democracy is sufficiently constitutionally problematic, at least when it comes to minority-targeting measures like Prop 8, that it should not be regarded as a weighty criticism if a constitutional doctrine does not zealously protect state power to use an unfettered initiative process to strip minorities of rights. The fact that the Perry majority rejected the Prop 8 proponents' and the dissenting Justices' invitations to take Article III standing doctrine down the path of empowering states to place appellate defense of discriminatory initiative measures in the hands of private persons lacking any meaningful accountability<sup>126</sup> or role constraints should carry little weight as an indictment of the majority's reasoning.

---

attribute of the fundamental interest in liberty and personal autonomy that the California Constitution secures to all persons for the benefit of both the individual and society"); id. at 424 (internal quotation marks omitted) ("[P]ast California decisions have described marriage as the most socially productive and individually fulfilling relationship that one can enjoy in the course of a lifetime"); Goodridge v. Dep't of Health, 798 N.E.2d 941, 954–55 (Mass. 2003) (internal quotation marks omitted) (describing civil marriage as "a social institution of the highest importance" and observing that "[t]he benefits accessible only by way of a marriage license are enormous, touching nearly every aspect of life and death").

<sup>124</sup> Cruz, supra note 32, at 47.

<sup>125</sup> Id. at 47–48.

<sup>126</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652, 2666–67 (2013) ("[P]etitioners answer to no one... Unlike California's attorney general, they are not elected"); but see id. at 2672 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) ("[The initiative] proponents, too, can have their authority terminated or their initiative overridden by a subsequent ballot measure.").

Our Federalism ought not be understood as prizing a state's ability to treat minorities of its population the way the Perry dissenters would have privileged it. The majority's rejection of the dissent's federalism-based arguments shows, at a minimum, that such putative state prerogatives rank low in a hierarchy of constitutional values. Maintaining a federal judiciary with a limited role and insisting that a state's litigation agents truly represent the people of the state clearly trumped the dissenters' more robust view of states' rights. It is of course true that the Perry majority analysis limits the standing of all personally uninjured parties in whom a state might seek to vest defense of any initiative, not just initiatives targeting minorities in ways similar to California's Proposition 8.<sup>127</sup> But this seems a modest price to pay for a federal standing doctrine that would not aggrandize those who would turn state law direct democracy provisions against politically vulnerable minorities.<sup>128</sup>

As a predictive matter, it should be noted, the Supreme Court seems unlikely any time soon to hold that initiatives and referenda are categorically unconstitutional, although some scholars have taken that position.<sup>129</sup> Indeed, the Court has granted review in a case from Michigan where the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals held unconstitutional<sup>130</sup> a state initiative that amended Michigan's constitution to bar affirmative action or any consideration of "on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin" in public colleges and universities, "public employment, public education, or public contracting."<sup>131</sup> The current Court displays marked hostility to race-based government action even when designed to include historically excluded minorities.<sup>132</sup> And in 1994, with a less conservative bench of Justices,<sup>133</sup> the Court went out of its

---

<sup>127</sup> See generally id.

<sup>128</sup> See Linde, supra note 110, at 32–38 (explaining that direct democracy initiatives that target minorities subjecting them to the swings of majority passions threaten republicanism).

<sup>129</sup> See, e.g., Catherine A. Rogers & David L. Faigman, "And to the Republic for Which It Stands"; Guaranteeing a Republican Form of Government, 23 Hastings Const. L.Q. 1057, xxx (1996) (arguing "that the Guarantee Clause establishes a per se prohibition against state initiatives").

<sup>130</sup> Coal. to Defend Affirmative Action v. Regents of the Univ. of Mich., 701 F.3d 466 (6th Cir. 2012).

<sup>131</sup> Mich. Const. art. I, § 26.

<sup>132</sup> See, e.g., Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557 (2009) (invalidating municipal rejection of promotion test that had not been validated for the firefighter positions at issue after test produced significant disparate impact on minorities); Parents Involved in Cmty. Schs. v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701 (2007) (invalidating race-based pupil-assignment schemes designed to avoid extremes of racial isolation in schools in district at issue).

<sup>133</sup> See, e.g., Adam Liptak, Court Under Roberts Is Most Conservative in Decades, New York Times (Jul. 24, 2010), <http://www.nytimes.com/2010/07/25/us/25roberts.html> (concluding that way to avoid relying on cases striking down initiative measures that operated to the particular detriment of racial minorities.<sup>134</sup> Given all this, the Court is unlikely to rule broadly that use of the initiative mechanism violates the U.S. Constitution. That does not necessarily mean that it would hold that the Constitution affirmatively protects or values states' authority to make law by initiative, or that it would not invalidate particular anti-lesbigay ballot measures as unconstitutional, perhaps on the ground that they are rooted in animus against lesbigay persons.

D. Future Defense of Prop 8 and Other State Initiatives

It is not apparent that the Supreme Court's ruling in Perry will have a major effect on standing determinations in other cases, for it shuts courthouse doors in strikingly limited circumstances. First, because Perry was rooted in Article III of the Constitution, it only applies to litigation in federal courts; state courts are free to adopt less restrictive standing rules and allow initiative proponents standing to defend and take appeals in defense of the initiatives they sponsored.<sup>135</sup> Second, if you have an actually, non-ideologically injured party seeking to appeal, federal litigation remains open.<sup>136</sup> If the District Court and Court of Appeals had ruled against the Perry plaintiffs and held that Prop 8 was constitutional, they would have still been denied marriage licenses and would have had standing to ask the Supreme Court to review that decision. If a member of a same-sex couple married in California while Prop 8 was enjoined contested the validity of the marriage by arguing that Prop 8 was in fact constitutional, say in a dispute over custody or marital property, he or she might be able to litigate the viability of Prop 8 and appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. Or if a third party were tangibly affected by a same-sex couple's marital rights, that party could likely claim injury and litigate the validity of Prop 8 and the

---

by the end of June 2010, the Roberts Court "became the most conservative one in living memory, based on an analysis of four sets of political science data").

<sup>134</sup> See Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 635-36 (1996) (affirming on a "different" rationale a state court decision that invalidated an anti-lesbigay state constitutional amendment "because it infringed the fundamental right of gays and lesbians to participate in the political process," a right the state court had derived in part from Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U. S. 385 (1969), and Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U. S. 457 (1982), cases the Romer Court characterized as "involving discriminatory restructuring of governmental decisionmaking").

<sup>135</sup> Cf. Garden State Equality v. Dow, No. L-1729-11 (N.J. Super. Sept. 27, 2013) ("New Jersey courts are not limited to the case or controversy requirement imposed on the federal courts by way of Article III of the Federal Constitution.") (internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>136</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, oral argument (Mar. 26, 2013) (Roberts, C.J.) ("I suppose there might be people out there with their own personal standing, someone who performs marriages and would like that to remain open to everyone but would prefer not to perform same-sex marriages, or other people. We seem to be addressing the case as if the only options are the proponents here or the State. I'm not sure there aren't other people out there with individual personalized injury that would satisfy Article III.").

marriage in federal court. Third, if the state official defendants in Perry would have litigated the case and lost, they would have had federal standing even under Perry to appeal to assert the state's interests.<sup>137</sup> Thus, only cases that fail to satisfy all of these alternative conditions would actually be governed by the Perry ruling.

At least one anti-LGBT group has tried to extend the reach of the Supreme Court's Perry decision. Christian right legal organization Liberty Counsel<sup>138</sup> has argued that Perry limits organizations' ability to intervene as defendants. Liberty Counsel represents a group of plaintiffs in Pickup v. Brown, a case presenting a constitutional challenge to California's new statutory ban on efforts to change the sexual orientation of minors by licensed mental healthcare professionals ("sexual orientation change efforts" or "SOCE").<sup>139</sup> Pickup was appealed from the U.S. District Court to the Northern District of California to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.<sup>140</sup> Two days after the Supreme Court's Perry decision, Liberty Counsel sent a letter to the Ninth Circuit arguing that Perry precluded standing for "intervening parties such as Equality California ['EQCA'] in this case [i.e., Pickup]."<sup>141</sup> As Liberty Counsel read Perry, "the Supreme Court held that a public interest group did not have Article III standing to defend a law merely because it supported the passage and adoption of such a law. .... The Court stated that public interest groups must have an actual injury to continue to defend a law that it has supported."<sup>142</sup>

As explained above, the Supreme Court's decision in Perry held that the ballot sponsors did not have standing to be litigating Prop 8 by themselves in federal court, and so could not appeal Judge Walker's decision where the state governmental defendants refused to do so.<sup>143</sup> Perry does not call into question the permissibility of the ballot sponsors' intervening in federal

---

<sup>137</sup> See, e.g., Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S.Ct. 2652, 2664 (2013) ("No one doubts that a State has a cognizable interest in the continued enforceability of its laws that is harmed by a judicial decision declaring a state law unconstitutional.") (internal quotation marks omitted)

<sup>138</sup> See About Us, Liberty Counsel, <http://www.lc.org/index.cfm?pid=14096> (last visited Aug. 22, 2013) (Liberty Counsel website characterizing the organization as a "Christian Ministry" "dedicated to advancing religious freedom, the sanctity of life, and the family since 1989").

<sup>139</sup> Pickup v. Brown, 728 F.3d 1042 (9th Cir. 2013).

<sup>140</sup> Case No. 12-17681, 2012 WL 6869637 (9th Cir. 2012).

<sup>141</sup> Pickup v. Brown, Case No. 12-17681, plaintiffs' Citation of Supplemental Authorities, F.R.App.P. 28(j), Local Rule 28-6 (June 28, 2013), <http://cdn.ca9.uscourts.gov/datastore/general/2013/06/28/12-17681%20Supplemental%20Authorities.pdf>.

<sup>142</sup> Id.

<sup>143</sup> Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013).

trial court to help defend Prop 8 in a proper case brought challenging Prop 8. Perry was a case primarily about standing to appeal.<sup>144</sup>

Here, however, assuming the Pickup plaintiffs challenging California's ban on sexual orientation conversion practices on minors have standing to sue in federal trial court, nothing in the Supreme Court's Perry decision states that interested groups cannot intervene to defend the California law. And, assuming one or more parties with standing asked the Ninth Circuit to review a federal trial court decision about the ban on appeal,<sup>145</sup> it is not clear why anything in Perry would keep the law's backers like EQCA from continuing to participate in the litigation. Perry presented a different situation in that there would have been no appellate litigation without the Prop 8 sponsors' filing an appeal.

In one of the two cases appealed to the Ninth Circuit, Pickup v. Brown,<sup>146</sup> an appeal consolidated with the other, Welch v. Brown,<sup>147</sup> the trial had court ruled that the challengers were unlikely to prevail and denied them a preliminary injunction.<sup>148</sup> To the extent the Pickup plaintiffs have standing to appeal that decision to the Ninth Circuit, which they would have if they have standing to file their federal court suit in the first place, standing rules should not prevent the law's supporters, such as the pro-LGBT equality non-profit organization Equality California, from joining the state in defending the law on appeal.<sup>149</sup> In Welch, the state was preliminarily enjoined from enforcing the law at least in some circumstances; it therefore has an injury that provides standing to appeal,<sup>150</sup> and since the state defendants chose to appeal,<sup>151</sup>

---

<sup>144</sup> Liberty Counsel's letter saw the glass half empty, saying the Court of Appeals had "merely accepted the district court's grant of intervention." Id.

<sup>145</sup> The state of California would be recognized by virtually all as having standing to appeal the Welch decision which enjoined the state from enforcing its law banning SOCE on minors. If the Pickup plaintiffs suffered an injury entitling them to challenge the law in federal court, then that same injury would support their standing to appeal the trial court decision denying them injunctive relief.

<sup>146</sup> 12-17681 (9th Cir. 2012).

<sup>147</sup> 13-15023 (9th Cir. 2012).

<sup>148</sup> Pickup v. Brown, No. 2:12-cv-02497-KJM- EFB (E.D. Cal. Dec. 4, 2012), 2012 WL 6021465, at *1.

<sup>149</sup> I should note that I assisted Equality California in understanding the potential outcomes in the Supreme Court's marriage cases and the preparation of press releases in conjunction therewith.

<sup>150</sup> See, e.g., Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652, 2664, 186 L. Ed. 2d 768 (2013) ("No one doubts that a State has a cognizable interest 'in the continued enforceability' of its laws that is harmed by a judicial decision declaring a state law unconstitutional." (quoting Maine v. Taylor, 477 U. S. 131, 137 (1986))).

EQCA, as the law's nongovernmental backers, again, should be able to continue to participate if it meets the federal standards for intervention. (If it did not, then intervention would be improper, but not because of the Supreme Court's Perry decision.) Basically, standing doctrine requires that there must be a case or controversy, a real live dispute between parties with real stakes in the matter, for a case to be in federal court. It is not totally settled, but a majority of federal appeals courts have held that if there is such a dispute, then others can participate in that litigation too without having to establish standing on their own.<sup>152</sup>

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in Pickup that the law banning SOCE against minors does not violate the First Amendment.<sup>153</sup> Its opinion does not squarely address the effect of Perry, if any, on the ability of a group like EQCA to intervene to defend a law it supports that is germane to its members interests. The Court of Appeals specifically concluded that it “need not resolve [the] question” of Perry's effect on EQCA's ability to intervene “because the State of <sup>151</sup> My view of the federalism concerns and state choices implicit in Perry differs from that claimed to underlie both Perry and Windsor by Eric Restuccia and Aaron Lindstrom in Federalism and the authority of the states to define marriage, SCOTUSblog (Jun. 27, 2013), <http://www.scotusblog.com/2013/06/federalism-and-the-authority-of-the-states-to-define-marriage/> (last visited August 27, 2013). They lay emphasis on the fact that the Attorney General of California chose not to defend or appeal the decision invalidating Proposition 8 and, rather wishfully, see the Court as having protected California's governmental choices to litigate or not. See id. (“In Hollingsworth, the Court rejects the standing of private parties to defend the constitutionality of a state statute where ‘state officials have chosen not to.’ On their face, as holdings, these decisions respect the principles of federalism, honoring the exclusive authority of the states to define and to defend marriage.”) (quoting Perry). The obvious problem with this states' rights Pollyannaism is that, at least according to the California Supreme Court, the state of California chose to vest defense of Proposition 8 in its official proponents. Thus, the choice of the Attorney General and Governor of California not to defend the measure should not be the end of the Supreme Court's concern, were the Court's line decision in Perry really driven by “state sovereignty.” Id.

---

<sup>152</sup> See, e.g., Canadian Wheat Board v. United States, 637 F. Supp. 2d 1329, 1338-42 (Ct. Int'l Trade 2009) (addressing circuit split favoring no need for intervenors in a proper case or controversy to establish their own Article III standing and siding with that majority view); Melissa Waver, Where Standing Closes a Door, May Intervention Open a Window? Article III, Rule 24(A), and Climate Change Solutions, 42 Env'tl. L. Rep. News & Analysis 10945, 10952 & nn. 105-07 (2012) (noting circuit split and same majority position).

<sup>153</sup> Pickup v. Brown, 728 F.3d 1042, 1048 (holding “that SB 1172, as a regulation of professional conduct, does not violate the free speech rights of SOCE practitioners or minor patients, is neither vague nor overbroad, and does not violate parents' fundamental rights”). Due to the plaintiffs' failure to adequately address their claim “that SB 1172 violates the religion clauses of the First Amendment,” the court “decline[d] to address” it but left it open for “[t]he district court [to] do so in the first instance.” Id. at *15 n.3.

California undoubtedly has standing to defend its statute, and ‘the presence in a suit of even one party with standing suffices to make a claim justiciable.’”<sup>154</sup> Pickup thus illustrates one more reason that it is unclear that Perry will have effects of much significance as far as federal court standing law, upon which Perry’s holding was based, is concerned.

II. Federalism Concerns in United States v. Windsor

Unlike in Hollingsworth v. Perry, the Supreme Court in United States v. Windsor<sup>155</sup> overcame the threshold jurisdictional issues to reach the equal protection merits of the challenge to Section 3 of the combatively named Defense of Marriage Act (“DOMA”).<sup>156</sup> DOMA Section 3, recall, defines marriage as male-female for almost all federal law, regardless of whether a state or another country allowed a same-sex couple to marry.<sup>157</sup> On the merits, the Court in Windsor held Section 3 unconstitutional as applied to same-sex couples validly married in states.<sup>158</sup> Unlike Perry in another way, Windsor is likely to have significant doctrinal repercussions, as is already becoming apparent.

Section A of this Part summarizes the Windsor litigation, including through the Supreme Court. Although it should be quite clear that the Court’s decision invalidating Section 3 of DOMA was based on equal protection principles, Section B of this Part makes the case for that conclusion in painstaking detail in light of Justice Scalia’s contention in dissent that the Court did not base its ruling on equal protection. Section C of this Part then considers the potential impact of Windsor on suits seeking to make not the federal government, as in Windsor, but rather one state recognize a same-sex couple’s marriage from another state. Finally, Section D takes up the question of the implications of Windsor for constitutional suits seeking to compel states to themselves let same-sex couples marry civilly.

A. The Windsor Litigation

United States v. Windsor arose after Edie Windsor’s partner of forty-four years and wife, Thea Spyer, died.<sup>159</sup> They had been legally married in Canada after four decades together,<sup>160</sup> and

---

<sup>154</sup> Id. at 1050 n.2 (quoting Brown v. City of Los Angeles, 521 F.3d 1238, 1240 n.1 (9th Cir. 2008) (per curiam)).

<sup>155</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675 (2013).

<sup>156</sup> Defense of Marriage Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-199 §2(a), 110 Stat. 2419 (codified at 1 U.S.C. § 7 and 28 U.S.C. § 1738C (2006)).

<sup>157</sup> See id. and accompanying text supra.

<sup>158</sup> See Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2695–86.

<sup>159</sup> “Edie Windsor and Thea Spyer shared their lives together as a committed couple for 44 years. They became a couple in 1965, got engaged in 1967, and married in Canada in 2007, after it became legal.... Thea died in 2009 ....” American Civil Liberties Union, Windsor v. United States the law of their home state of New York recognized their marriage.<sup>161</sup> If the federal government did likewise, Edie would have qualified for the surviving spouse tax exemption from the federal estate tax; because Section 3 of DOMA denied federal recognition of their marriage, however, the government insisted that Edie pay the Treasury $363,053.<sup>162</sup> She challenged this treatment as denying her the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment.<sup>163</sup>

After U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder announced that he and President Barack Obama had concluded that Windsor's contention was correct, that Section 3 of DOMA was unconstitutional as applied to validly married same-sex couples, and that the Department of Justice would not defend Edie's lawsuit,<sup>164</sup> the House Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group ("BLAG") intervened to defend the law, acting on a three-to-two party vote (with the Republicans voting to defend DOMA and the Democrats voting against doing so).<sup>165</sup>

The federal district court in Windsor held that Section 3 was unconstitutional.<sup>166</sup> The Administration declined to provide Windsor her tax refund, even though it believed her legal position correct. Rather, both BLAG and the Justice Department appealed the decision, the latter not seeking reversal but affirmance. While the case was pending before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, the Justice Department filed a petition for a writ of certiorari before judgment in the case, which Windsor agreed the Supreme Court should grant but which

---

- Frequently Asked Questions (FAQ), <https://www.aclu.org/lgbt-rights/windsor-v-united-states-frequently-asked-questions-faq> (last visited Sept. 29, 2013).

<sup>160</sup> See id.

<sup>161</sup> Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2683 (citing United States v. Windsor, 699 F.3d 169, 177-78 (2d Cir. 2012)).

<sup>162</sup> Id.

<sup>163</sup> Id. Because the defendant was the federal government, the suit relied on the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, rather than on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which applies to state and local government, as discussed below.

<sup>164</sup> Letter from the Attorney General to Congress on Litigation Involving the Defense of Marriage Act (Feb. 23, 2011), available at <http://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/2011/February/11-ag-223.html> (last visited Aug. 27, 2013).

<sup>165</sup> See Brief for Court-Appointed Amica Curiae Addressing Jurisdiction at 2-3, United States v. Windsor, No. 12-307 (Jan. 24, 2013) (timing and vote); David Baumann, The Defense of Marriage Act, <http://uspolitics.about.com/od/gaymarriage/a/The-Defense-Of-Marriage-Act.htm> (last visited Sept. 29, 2013) (noting party-line vote split). Later a majority of the House of Representatives voted to authorize the continued defense of Section 3.

<sup>166</sup> Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2684.

BLAG opposed. Before the Court acted on that petition, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court.<sup>167</sup> Strikingly, alone among current Court of Appeals cases, it held that sexual orientation is a suspect classification requiring strict scrutiny and that DOMA Section 3 could not satisfy such scrutiny.<sup>168</sup> The Administration then asked the Court to treat its request as a regular certiorari petition (not one requesting unusual review before the lower court ruled).

The Supreme Court granted the Administration's petition for certiorari, but also directed the parties to brief whether there was a proper case for the Court to decide in light of the Administration's agreement with Edie Windsor that DOMA Section 3 was unconstitutional. After hearing argument, the Court concluded that there was a proper case or controversy before it<sup>169</sup> and that Section 3 was indeed unconstitutional.<sup>170</sup> The ruling was five-to-four, with more liberal justices Ginsburg, Breyer, Kagan, and Sotomayor joining Justice Kennedy's majority opinion. Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Thomas (in opinions by the Chief Justice and Justice Scalia) concluded that there was not a proper case before the Court, and that even if there were, DOMA Section 3 did not violate the Constitution's equality guarantees; Justice Alito thought that BLAG had standing to bring the case, but agreed with the other dissenters that DOMA Section 3 was constitutional.<sup>171</sup>

Despite expressing skepticism about the Executive's decision not to defend the constitutionality of Section 3 of DOMA,<sup>172</sup> the Windsor majority concluded that "[i]n this case the United States retains a stake sufficient to support Article III jurisdiction on appeal and in

---

<sup>167</sup> Id.

<sup>168</sup> See Windsor v. United States, 699 F.3d 169, 185 (2d Cir. 2012).

<sup>169</sup> Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2680.

<sup>170</sup> Id. at 20, 25.

<sup>171</sup> Id. at 2696 (Roberts, C.J., dissenting); id. at 2697-98 (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., and in Part I by Roberts, C.J., dissenting); id. at 2711-12 (Alito, J., joined in parts II and III by Thomas, J.).

<sup>172</sup> Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court characterizes the Attorney General's letter announcing that the President had determined Section 3 to be unconstitutional and refusing to defend its constitutionality as "reflect[ing] the Executive's own conclusion, relying on a definition still being debated and considered in the courts, that heightened equal protection scrutiny should apply to laws that classify on the basis of sexual orientation." Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2683-84. And in further addressing the standing issue, the Court wrote: "The Executive's failure to defend the constitutionality of an Act of Congress based on a constitutional theory not yet established in judicial decisions has created a procedural dilemma." Id. at 2688.

proceedings before this Court” despite its position on DOMA’s unconstitutionality.<sup>173</sup> The Court accepted that the obligation to pay Windsor’s tax refund counts as an injury, whether or not the government agrees that it was legally obliged to pay, and that “Windsor’s ongoing claim for funds that the United States refuses to pay thus establishes a controversy sufficient for Article III jurisdiction.”<sup>174</sup> To the extent that the posture of the case raised prudential concerns, the Court held them allayed by BLAG’s substantive defense of Section III and the importance of resolving the question of the constitutionality of this federal law.<sup>175</sup>

On the merits, a majority of the Court agreed with the United States and Edie Windsor that Section 3 of DOMA was unconstitutional.<sup>176</sup> The Court extensively recounted the primary role of states (rather than the federal government) in regulating “domestic relations” including marriage, an allocation of authority set aside by Section 3.<sup>177</sup> Rather than address “whether this federal intrusion on state power is a violation of the Constitution because it disrupts the federal balance,”<sup>178</sup> the Court treated the “unusual character” of the discrimination wrought by DOMA as a reason to give “careful consideration” to the question of its constitutionality.<sup>179</sup> And the Court did so, noting the broad sweep of DOMA’s Section 3,<sup>180</sup> recounting expressed prejudice in DOMA’s legislative history,<sup>181</sup> and detailing some of the wide range of economic and dignitary harms it inflicts on married same-sex couples.<sup>182</sup>

B. The Doctrinal Basis for Kennedy’s Opinion of the Court

---

<sup>173</sup> Id. at 2686.

<sup>174</sup> Id.

<sup>175</sup> Id. at 2687–89.

<sup>176</sup> Id. at 2693, 2695.

<sup>177</sup> Id. at 2689–92.

<sup>178</sup> Id. at 2692.

<sup>179</sup> Id.

<sup>180</sup> Id. at 2694 (“DOMA writes inequality into the entire United States Code.... Among the over 1,000 statutes and numerous federal regulations that DOMA controls are laws pertaining to Social Security, housing, taxes, criminal sanctions, copyright, and veterans’ benefits.”).

<sup>181</sup> Id. at 2693–4. According to the Court in Windsor, the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit was corrected that Congress’s “goal” with Section 3 “was ‘to put a thumb on the scales and influence a state’s decision as to how to shape its marriage laws.’” Id. (quoting Massachusetts v. United States Dept. of Health and Human Servs., 682 F. 3d 1, 12–13 (1st Cir. 2012)).

<sup>182</sup> Id. at 2694–95.

As he did in the Supreme Court's two other major LGBT rights decisions, Romer v. Evans<sup>183</sup> and Lawrence v. Texas,<sup>184</sup> Justice Anthony Kennedy again wrote for the Court in United States v. Windsor. Joined by the Court's four more liberal Justices,<sup>185</sup> Justice Kennedy's majority opinion held that Section 3 of the so-called Defense of Marriage Act ("DOMA"),<sup>186</sup> which sought to exclude same-sex couples from the definition of "marriage" and "spouse" for all federal laws,<sup>187</sup> was unconstitutional. Contrary to protestations of bafflement in Justice Scalia's obstreperous dissent,<sup>188</sup> the Windsor majority opinion clearly relied on the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection of the laws, as explained in the first subsection below.<sup>189</sup> Scalia's slightly better point, however, addressed in the next section, was that the significance of federalism in the Court's opinion was underspecified. Indeed, Justice Scalia disparages the majority's rationale for its possible reliance on "some amorphous federalism component"<sup>190</sup> – a point taken up in the second subsection following.<sup>191</sup>

1. Equal Protection at Its Core

Pace Scalia, it should be beyond dispute that the Court's opinion in Windsor was predicated on equal protection principles; I make the point here, at some length in an effort to steer lower federal and state courts away from the confusion Scalia is seemingly trying to sow. First, the sole question presented in the U.S. government's petition for certiorari in Windsor was "[w]hether Section 3 of DOMA violates the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection of the laws as applied to persons of the same sex who are legally married under the laws of their

---

<sup>183</sup> 517 U.S. 620 (1996).

<sup>184</sup> 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

<sup>185</sup> Specifically, Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, Kagan, and Sotomayor joined Justice Kennedy's opinion.

<sup>186</sup> 110 Stat. 2419, 1 U. S. C. §7 (2013).

<sup>187</sup> Section 3 of DOMA amended the federal Dictionary Act, 1 U.S.C. §7, to restrictively provide that, regardless of state law, in determining the meaning of any Act of Congress, or of any ruling, regulation, or interpretation of the various administrative bureaus and agencies of the United States, the word "marriage" means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, and the word "spouse" refers only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife. 110 Stat. 2419, 1 U. S. C. §7 (2013).

<sup>188</sup> See text accompanying note infra.

<sup>189</sup> See infra 1. Equal Protection at its Core.

<sup>190</sup> Windsor at 2707 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>191</sup> See infra 2.

State.”<sup>192</sup> Since the Supreme Court is only supposed to decide that question or subsidiary questions “fairly included therein,”<sup>193</sup> the Court would have strayed far from its officially approved practice if it did not address that equal protection question.

Second, in turning to the merits of the constitutional challenge, after recounting the basic facts of Edie Windsor and Thea Spyer’s wedding, the Court’s opinion “conclude that, until recent years, many citizens had not even considered the possibility that two persons of the same sex might aspire to occupy the same status and dignity as that of a man and woman in lawful marriage.”<sup>194</sup> This language of “occupy[ing] the same status and dignity” sounds in equal protection, a constitutional protection which the Court’s earlier opinion in Romer v. Evans<sup>195</sup> suggested is suspicious of “status-based enactment[s]” or “a classification of persons undertaken for its own sake.”<sup>196</sup> Although only a minority of states allowed same-sex couples to marry,<sup>197</sup> the Court understood those states to have “decided that same-sex couples should have the right to marry and so live with pride in themselves and their union and in a status of equality with all other married persons.”<sup>198</sup> When the Court’s opinion turned to analyzing Section 3’s constitutionality, the Court observed that “its operation is directed to a class of persons that the laws of New York, and of 11 other States, have sought to protect.”<sup>199</sup> This discussion about “a class of persons” is likewise language of equal protection, which has long been understood to

---

<sup>192</sup> Brief for Appellate at I, United States v. Windsor, 133 S.Ct. 2675 (2013) (No. 12-307).

<sup>193</sup> Sup. Ct. R. 14.1(a).

<sup>194</sup> Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2689.

<sup>195</sup> 517 U.S. 620 (1996).

<sup>196</sup> See Romer.

<sup>197</sup> See Kate Zernika & Marc Santora, As Gays Wed in New Jersey, Christie Ends Court Fight, NY Times, Oct. 21, 2013, at <http://www.nytimes.com/2013/10/22/nyregion/christie-withdraws-appeal-of-same-sex-marriage-ruling-in-new-jersey.html> (“His decision not to appeal a judge’s ruling that allowed the weddings removed the last hurdle to legalized same-sex marriage in New Jersey, making it the 14th state, along with the District of Columbia, to allow gay couples to wed.”); Lambda Legal, http://www.lambdalegal.org/news/il\_20131105\_victory-as-illinois-becomes-15th-marriage-state-lambda-legal-celebrates (Nov. 5, 2013) (“Governor Quinn has pledged to sign the bill, making Illinois the 15th state in the country and the third in the Midwest to grant same-sex couples the freedom to marry. Once signed, the law will go into effect June 1st, 2014.”).

<sup>198</sup> Id. (emphasis supplied).

<sup>199</sup> Id. at 16 (emphasis supplied).

prohibit “class legislation”<sup>200</sup> and whose constitutional doctrine focuses on the “classification” embodied in challenged government action.<sup>201</sup>

The Court continued its focus on inequality when it observed that “DOMA rejects the long-established precept that the incidents, benefits, and obligations of marriage are uniform for all married couples within each State, though they may vary, subject to constitutional guarantees, from one state to the next.”<sup>202</sup> Viewed this way, DOMA’s discrimination was unusual, and “[d]iscriminations of an unusual character especially suggest careful consideration to determine whether they are obnoxious to the constitutional provision[.]” the Court told us,<sup>203</sup> quoting its decision in Romer v. Evans,<sup>204</sup> which in turn was quoting Louisville Gas & Electric Co. v. Coleman.<sup>205</sup> “[T]he constitutional provision” at issue in Romer and Louisville Gas & Electric Co. was the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, again showing that Windsor is an equal protection decision.<sup>206</sup>

Of course, the Equal Protection Clause does not by its terms apply to the federal government; rather, it provides: “No State shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.”<sup>207</sup> Where the federal government is concerned, the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause is the primary textual home of the Constitution’s guarantee of constitutional equality, as the Court’s doctrine for decades has recognized.<sup>208</sup> As the Court said in Brown v. Board of Education’s companion case Bolling v. Sharpe, condemning racial school segregation by the District of Columbia, a federal governmental entity, “discrimination may be so unjustifiable as to be violative of due process.”<sup>209</sup> That is, certain unequal treatment deprives people of liberty (or property or even life, one might suppose) without due process of law. This

---

<sup>200</sup> Cruz, supra note 32.

<sup>201</sup> See, e.g., Robert C. Farrell, Affirmative Action and the “Individual” Right to Equal Protection, 71 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 241, 245-63 (2009) (addressing “The Supreme Court Precedents on Equality as a Limit on Governmental Classification”).

<sup>202</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2692 (2013) 18 (emphasis added).

<sup>203</sup> Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>204</sup> 517 U. S. 620, 633 (1996).

<sup>205</sup> 277 U. S. 32, 37–38 (1928).

<sup>206</sup> Romer, 517 U.S. at 620; Louisville Gas & Electric Co. 227 U.S. at 32.

<sup>207</sup> U.S. Const. amend. XIV (emphasis added).

<sup>208</sup> See, e.g., Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200 (1995).

<sup>209</sup> Bolling, 347 U.S. at 499.

doctrinal guarantee is commonly known as “the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause” of the Fifth Amendment.<sup>210</sup>

That is why the Court’s opinion in Windsor says that the case requires the Court “to address whether the resulting injury and indignity is a deprivation of an essential part of the liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment.”<sup>211</sup> Because the federal government is subjected to an equal protection guarantee through the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, it should be unexceptionable that the Windsor opinion declares that DOMA “violates basic due process and equal protection principles applicable to the Federal Government.”<sup>212</sup> When the Supreme Court criticizes DOMA because, in the majority’s view, it “seeks to injure” same-sex couples married under state law, the Court repeats its forty-year-old conclusion that “[t]he Constitution’s guarantee of equality ‘must at the very least mean that a bare congressional desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot’ justify disparate treatment of that group.”<sup>213</sup> This invocation of “[t]he Constitution’s guarantee of equality” clearly signals that equal protection is doing the work here, as does the Court’s focus on “disparate treatment,” a core equal protection concern. Moreover, the case that articulated this principle quoted in Windsor, Department of Agriculture v. Moreno,<sup>214</sup> was one in which the Court held a federal law to violate the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment (as Justice Scalia acknowledges in his Windsor dissent).<sup>215</sup>

The Court in Windsor explained the deficiencies of Section 3 in terms that should leave no room for doubt that the Court held that the law violates equal protection principles. In discussing the breadth of the law, the Court observed that “DOMA writes inequality into the entire United States Code.”<sup>216</sup> The Court identified Section 3’s purpose and effects with inequality: “DOMA’s principal effect is to identify a subset of state-sanctioned marriages and make them unequal. The principal purpose is to impose inequality . . . .”<sup>217</sup>

When the Windsor Court concludes that it must “hold, as it now does, that DOMA is unconstitutional as a deprivation of the liberty of the person protected by the Fifth Amendment

---

<sup>210</sup> Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 675 (2009); See, e.g., United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2706 n.5 (2013) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (quoting Dep’t of Agric. v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528, 533 (1973)).

<sup>211</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2692 (2013).

<sup>212</sup> Id. at 2693.

<sup>213</sup> Id. (quoting Dep’t of Agric. v. Moreno, 413 U. S. 528, 534–535 (1973)).

<sup>214</sup> 413 U. S. 528 (1973).

<sup>215</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2697 (2013) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>216</sup> Id. at 2694.

<sup>217</sup> Id.

of the Constitution[,]”<sup>218</sup> the Court is invoking the Constitution’s equal protection obligation on the federal government.<sup>219</sup> The very next sentence of the opinion explains unequivocally that “[t]he liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause contains within it the prohibition against denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.”<sup>220</sup> In support of this contention, the Windsor opinion cites Bolling v. Sharpe,<sup>221</sup> the case that first expressly held there to be an equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, and Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, which held that the equal protection standard applicable to the federal government under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment is coextensive with the equal protection standard applicable to the states through the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.<sup>222</sup>

All the preceding might sound like overkill to establish the obvious meaning of Justice Kennedy’s opinion for the Court in Windsor. What warrants the extended explication is that Justice Scalia purports to be perplexed<sup>223</sup> by the majority’s immediately following statement that “[w]hile the Fifth Amendment itself withdraws from Government the power to degrade or demean in the way this law does, the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment makes that Fifth Amendment right all the more specific and all the better understood and preserved.”<sup>224</sup> “The only possible interpretation of this statement,” Scalia asserts, “is that the Equal Protection Clause, even the Equal Protection Clause as incorporated in the Due Process Clause, is not the basis for today’s holding.”<sup>225</sup> Scalia does not offer any explanation for why he interprets the Court’s sentence the counterintuitive way that he does, perhaps because there is no explanation.

The Court forthrightly states in the first half of its sentence under discussion here that the Fifth Amendment renders Section 3 of DOMA unconstitutional.<sup>226</sup> That first half of the sentence neither expressly asserts nor denies that it is the equal protection component of the Due Process

---

<sup>218</sup> Id. at 2695.

<sup>219</sup> Id.

<sup>220</sup> Id.

<sup>221</sup> 347 U. S. 497, 499–500 (1954).

<sup>222</sup> 515 U. S. 200, 217–218 (1995).

<sup>223</sup> See United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2697 (2013) (Scalia, J., dissenting). slip op. at 16.

<sup>224</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2695 (2013).

<sup>225</sup> Id. at 2706.

<sup>226</sup> See id.

Clause of that amendment which renders Section 3 unconstitutional.<sup>227</sup> But the second half of the contested sentence is entirely consistent with this article’s foregoing equal protection analysis. In saying that the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause makes the Fifth Amendment right against such stigmatizing class legislation more specific, comprehended, and meaningful, the Court is simply echoing what the Supreme Court said in Bolling v. Sharpe back in 1954: “The ‘equal protection of the laws’ is a more explicit safeguard of prohibited unfairness than ‘due process of law,’ ... [b]ut, as this Court has recognized, discrimination may be so unjustifiable as to be violative of due process.”<sup>228</sup> As scholars including Akhil Amar have recognized, the later-enacted Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment clarifies the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause.<sup>229</sup> And as for the notion that the Fourteenth Amendment’s specification of the equal protection mandate makes the right to due process better understood and protected, recall Chief Justice Marshall’s words for the Court in Marbury v. Madison: “The powers of the Legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the Constitution is written.”<sup>230</sup>

The only potentially real question is not whether equal protection undergirds the Court’s holding in Windsor, but whether the opinion also rests on substantive due process protection of liberty.<sup>231</sup> Justice Scalia’s dissent, not without reason, sees indications of “the dread” doctrine of “substantive due process” in the majority opinion.<sup>232</sup> As he writes:

The majority opinion ... says that DOMA is unconstitutional as ‘a deprivation of the liberty of the person protected by the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution,’; that it violates ‘basic due process’ principles; and that it inflicts an ‘injury and indignity’ of a kind that denies ‘an essential part of the liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment.’<sup>233</sup>

---

<sup>227</sup> See id.

<sup>228</sup> 347 U.S. 497, 499 (1954).

<sup>229</sup> See, e.g., Akhil Reed Amar, Intratextualism, 112 Harv. L. Rev. 747, 772 (1999) (“[F]or the framers and ratifiers of the Fourteenth Amendment, the words of its Equal Protection Clause were not expressing a different idea than the words of the Due Process Clause but were elaborating the same idea: the Equal Protection Clause was in part a clarifying gloss on the due process idea.”).

<sup>230</sup> Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 176 (1803).

<sup>231</sup> See, e.g., Nancy C. Marcus, “Argle Bargle,” or Deeply-Rooted Principles of Equal Liberty? The Inevitability of Marriage Equality after Windsor, 23 Tul. J.L. & Sexuality (forthcoming) (on file with author) (arguing that Windsor is an “equal liberty” case that “unif[ies] principles of equal protection and liberty”) (at m.s. 10) .

<sup>232</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2697 (2013) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>233</sup> Id. at 2706 (quoting majority op. at 25, 20, and 19, respectively).

“And,” Windsor states, “though Congress has great authority to design laws to fit its own conception of sound national policy, it cannot deny the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.”<sup>234</sup>

Marriage equality litigation in the wake of Windsor has relied on the case in suits pressing not just equal protection claims but also substantive due process/fundamental rights claims. In Pennsylvania, for example, the ACLU is suing the state, arguing that its refusal to let same-sex couples marry and its refusal to recognize the marriages of same-sex couples validly entered in other states are unconstitutional.<sup>235</sup> The ACLU<sup>236</sup> argues that “Pennsylvania's exclusion of same-sex couples from marriage infringes on the Due Process Clause and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.”

<sup>237</sup>Independently of the discrimination argument under the Equal Protection Clause, the plaintiffs argue that Pennsylvania’s denial of marriage to same-sex couples receives strict scrutiny “because it burdens the fundamental right to marry.”<sup>238</sup> Most of the complaint does not differentiate between the equal protection and due process claims.<sup>239</sup> Thus, the Introduction of the complaint argues that “[t]he exclusion from marriage undermines the plaintiff couples’ ability to achieve their life goals and dreams, threatens their mutual economic stability, and denies them,” here quoting Windsor, “a dignity and status of immense import.”<sup>240</sup>

More dramatically, at least one complaint appears to have already interpreted Windsor to mean that the Due Process Clause’s substantive protection of “liberty” embraces same-sex couples’ freedom to marry. In Griego v. Oliver, six couples are challenging the state of New Mexico’s refusal to allow same-sex couples to marry civilly or to recognize same-sex couples’

---

<sup>234</sup> Id. at 2695.

<sup>235</sup> See ACLU, Whitewood v. Corbett, aclu.org (July 11, 2013), <https://www.aclu.org/lgbt-rights/whitewood-v-corbett>. Although I served as a board-elected General Counsel for the national ACLU during some of the period of the preparation of this article, I did not participate in the Whitewood litigation.

<sup>236</sup> Complaint for Declaratory and Injunctive Relief, Whitewood v. Corbett, No. 1-13-cv-01861-1 (filed July 9, 2013), available at https://www.aclu.org/files/assets/whitewood\_v.\_corbett\_-\_complaint.pdf.

<sup>237</sup> Id. ¶ 15, at 5.

<sup>238</sup> Id. ¶ 15.

<sup>239</sup> Id.

<sup>240</sup> Id. ¶ 10 (quoting United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, PINCITE (2013). (he used page 18 here for the slip op for Windsor))

marriages validly entered in other jurisdictions.<sup>241</sup> In seeking (ultimately unsuccessfully)<sup>242</sup> a writ of mandamus from the New Mexico Supreme Court to cut the litigation shorter, the Griego plaintiffs relied on federal precedents to argue that “[b]arring same-sex couples from marriage violates New Mexico’s due process guarantee by depriving them of the fundamental right to marry.”<sup>243</sup> In arguing that “denying recognition to same-sex couples who legally married in another jurisdiction would ... violate their right to due process under the New Mexico Constitution,” the Griego plaintiffs read Windsor to have “specifically held that married same-sex couples who are legally married under state law have a protected liberty interest in their marriage under the federal Due Process Clause.”<sup>244</sup> The language they quoted from Windsor?: “DOMA is unconstitutional as a deprivation of the liberty of the person protected by the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution.”<sup>245</sup>

The Supreme Court undeniably said that. And it is one of the passages to which Justice Scalia pointed in accusing the Court of relying on substantive due process to invalidate Section 3 of DOMA.<sup>246</sup> Justice Scalia may have made this interpretive claim in order to further his apparent desire to minimize the import of Windsor, expecting that “lower federal courts and state courts can distinguish today’s case when the issue before them is state denial of marital status to same-sex couples”<sup>247</sup> and exhorting them to do so.<sup>248</sup> Yet I have already explained why the <sup>241</sup> I should note that I am close friends with one of the plaintiff couples seeking recognition of an extraterritorially entered marriage, having met and become friends with one member of the couple almost a quarter century ago and, subsequently, his husband.

---

<sup>242</sup> See Steve Terrell, NM High Court Won't Immediately Hear Marriage Equality Cases, Roundhouse Roundup: The Blog, <http://roundhouseroundup.blogspot.com/2013/08/nm-high-court-wont-immediately-hear.html> (last visited Aug. 28, 2013), (reporting denial without prejudice of petition for writ of mandamus in Griego v. Oliver (NM Aug. 16, 2013)); Order, Hanna v. Salazar, No. 34,216 (N.M. Aug. 15, 2013), available at <http://www.scribd.com/doc/160797573/NM-SUPREME-ORDER-DENYING-IMMEDIATE-CONSIDERATION-of-SAME-SEX-MARRIAGE-CASES> (last visited Aug. 28, 2013) (denying without prejudice petition for writ of mandamus).

<sup>243</sup> Verified Petition for Writ of Mandamus at 22, Griego v. Oliver, (July 2, 2013), available at <http://www.scribd.com/doc/151566993/New-Mexico-Supreme-Court-Writ-of-Mandamus> (last visited Aug. 28, 2013).

<sup>244</sup> Id. at 23 (citing United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675 (2013)).

<sup>245</sup> Verified Petition for Writ of Mandamus at 23, Griego v. Oliver, (July 2, 2013), available at <http://www.scribd.com/doc/151566993/New-Mexico-Supreme-Court-Writ-of-Mandamus> (last visited Aug. 28, 2013) (quoting United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2680 (pg. 25) (2013)).

<sup>246</sup> See supra text accompanying footnote 196.

<sup>247</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2709 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

Court's language is best understood as reflecting reliance on the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Ironically, then, in light of the Griego plaintiff's use of Windsor to support a substantive liberty-based (rather than equality-based) argument against exclusion of same-sex couples from civil marriage, Scalia's studied obtuseness may actually undermine his preferred constitutional interpretation in the lower courts.

2. "Amorphous Federalism" in the Court's Reasoning

Justice Scalia's grouching about the role of federalism in the Windsor majority opinion is not as baseless as his questioning whether that opinion rests on equal protection principles. He questioned why the majority opinion continued to advert to "the usual tradition of recognizing and accepting state definitions of marriage" even after it "formally disclaimed reliance upon principles of federalism ...."<sup>249</sup> At the end of the day, for Justice Scalia, "[t]he sum of all the Court's nonspecific hand-waving is that this law is invalid (maybe on equal-protection grounds, maybe on substantive-due-process grounds, and perhaps with some amorphous federalism component playing a role). . . ."<sup>250</sup> While there is some merit to his concerns, I do not think the Court's deployment of federalism is quite as indistinct as Justice Scalia suggests.

One could certainly envision an opinion relying on federalism as a factor of unspecified weight and/or unclear doctrinal significance. The Court could have relied on the fact that DOMA Section 3 deals regulates marriage, part of domestic relations, which is "one of the still paradigmatic cases of matters said to lie properly with the states."<sup>251</sup> That fact could have been said to "weigh against" the constitutionality of the law, without the Court ever attempting to quantify such weight.<sup>252</sup> I myself previously sketched what such an "uncategorical" treatment of <sup>248</sup> See id. (avowing that "an opinion with such scatter-shot rationales as this one ... can be distinguished in many ways," opining that the majority's opinion "deserves to be" so distinguished, and bluntly concluding that "state and lower federal courts should take the Court at its word and distinguish away").

---

<sup>249</sup> Id. at 2705 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (quoting majority op. at 2681).

<sup>250</sup> Id. at .

<sup>251</sup> David B. Cruz, The Defense of Marriage Act and Uncategorical Federalism, 19 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 805, 817 (2011).

<sup>252</sup> Cf. Bendix Autolite Corp. v. Midwesco Enters., 486 U.S. 888, 897 (1988) (Scalia, J., concurring) (criticizing notion of interest "balancing" because "the interests on both sides are incommensurate. It is more like judging whether a particular line is longer than a particular rock is heavy.").

federalism objections to DOMA Section 3 might look like.<sup>253</sup> The regulation of “domestic relations” could have been just one of a series of unquantified (or “amorphous,” in Scalia’s parlance<sup>254</sup>) factors informing a judgment that Section 3 was unconstitutional: It is a federal law that operates in the core of the field of domestic relations, an arena historically and to this day still frequently said to be the near-exclusive preserve of state authority. It operates not in discrete operational settings carefully judged by Congress to require federal displacement of state law definitions of marital status, but across the board in virtually any area in which the federal government acts. It purports to be a definitional statute, but it selectively defines as not married couples (of the same-sex) who are in fact married under state laws that the federal government otherwise uses for determining people’s marital status, thus casting egalitarian state laws and couples who have taken advantages of them in a false light.<sup>255</sup> But that is not how the Court in Windsor treated federalism.

After recounting the process whereby New York and some other states “concluded that same-sex marriage ought to be given recognition and validity in the law for those same-sex couples who wish to define themselves by their commitment to each other” because the mixed-sex requirement for civil marriage “came to be seen [there] as an unjust exclusion[.]”<sup>256</sup> the Court in Windsor asserted that as the “beginning point” for deciding whether Section 3 was unconstitutional it should consider “the design, purpose, and effect of DOMA” “[a]gainst this background of lawful same-sex marriage in some states.”<sup>257</sup> Thus, the Court in its initial brush with federalism in Windsor suggests that the legal landscape provides important context against which to assess the structure, intent, and consequences of Section 3 of DOMA. This initial suggestion is completely unexceptionable.

“By history and tradition the definition and regulation of marriage,” the Court next summarizes, “has been treated as being within the authority and realm of the separate States.”<sup>258</sup> At the same time, the federal government has adopted laws “that bear on marital rights and privileges” or “affect marriages and family status.”<sup>259</sup> Governmental authority over civil marriage thus has been shared between federal and state governments, so the Court was not saying that merely touching on domestic relations made Section 3 of DOMA unconstitutional.

---

<sup>253</sup> See generally Cruz, supra note , at 814-27 (identifying several factors that collectively might be taken to render DOMA Section 3 unconstitutional on federalism grounds).

<sup>254</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2707 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>255</sup> Id. at 827 (footnote omitted).

<sup>256</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2689 (2013).

<sup>257</sup> Id.

<sup>258</sup> Id. at 2689-90.

<sup>259</sup> Id. at 2690.

Yet DOMA appeared to the Court different from earlier federal actions where Congress enacted “discrete statutes” or somewhat narrowly “limited federal laws” to further constitutionally permissible federal policies.<sup>260</sup> And thus Section 3’s constitutionality cannot be taken for granted but must be analyzed. DOMA’s applicability to nearly the entirety of federal law appears against this background as an “intervention” in the usual distribution of marriage regulations.<sup>261</sup>

“In order to assess the validity of that intervention,” the Court maintains, “it is necessary to discuss the extent of the state power and authority over marriage as a matter of history and tradition.”<sup>262</sup> This pronouncement seems to be key to Justice Scalia’s objections. For after providing what Scalia counts as “seven full pages about the traditional power of States to define domestic relations,”<sup>263</sup> the majority opinion concludes that “it is unnecessary to decide whether this federal intrusion on state power is a violation of the Constitution because it disrupts the federal balance.”<sup>264</sup> Because Scalia thinks that “no one questions the power of the states to define marriage (with the concomitant conferral of dignity and status),” he cannot see “the point of devoting seven pages to describing how long and well established that power is[.]”<sup>265</sup> But whether contested or not, the pedigree and breadth of state authority over marriage and domestic relations more generally is relevant on the majority’s terms, terms that are quite comprehensible within conventional equal protection doctrine, without recourse to the kind of amorphous federalism” that Scalia took the Court to be arguing. In particular, as the Court goes on to explain, the deep rootedness of state (rather than federal) authority over marriage serves an evidentiary function.<sup>266</sup> DOMA Section 3 is unusual in that it “rejects the long established precept that the incidents, benefits, and obligations of marriage are uniform for all married couples within each State, though they may vary, subject to constitutional guarantees, from one State to the next.”<sup>267</sup> And as noted above, the Court said again that “[d]iscriminations of an unusual character especially suggest careful consideration to determine whether they are obnoxious to [equal protection].”<sup>268</sup> Since “DOMA, because of its reach and extent, departs from

---

<sup>260</sup> Id.; cf. Cruz, supra note , at 822 (“With the enactment of section 3 of DOMA, Congress created a type of federal family law that is very different from the definitional sections of individual statutes, which apply only within the boundaries of those statutes.”).

<sup>261</sup> See Windsor, 133 S. Ct. at 2691.

<sup>262</sup> Id.

<sup>263</sup> Id. at 2705 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>264</sup> Id. at 2692 (majority opinion).

<sup>265</sup> Id. at 2705 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>266</sup> Id. at 2693 (majority opinion).

<sup>267</sup> Id. at 2692.

<sup>268</sup> Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). See quoted text accompanying note

this history and tradition of reliance on state law to define marriage[.]”<sup>269</sup> the Court should be understood to believe DOMA more likely reflects animus against same-sex couples than would a federal law that adhered to the more usual allocation of governmental authority.<sup>270</sup> In the Windsor majority’s own words, the responsibility of the States for the regulation of domestic relations is an important indicator of the substantial societal impact the State’s classifications have in the daily lives and customs of its people. DOMA’s unusual deviation from the usual tradition of recognizing and accepting state definitions of marriage here operates to deprive same-sex couples of the benefits and responsibilities that come with the federal recognition of their marriages. This is strong evidence of a law having the purpose and effect of disapproval of that class.<sup>271</sup>

This evidentiary inference is plausible, and more plausible than others enshrined in Supreme Court jurisprudence.<sup>272</sup> If a particular tradition allocating authority to the states is both broad and deep, one might expect that the federal government would have powerful reasons before it derogates from it. In order to determine whether the United States has such reasons, courts must give the challenged, unusual law “careful consideration”; otherwise, if ordinary rational basis review were used, the Court would only assess whether the law has the most tenuous conceivable connection to some merely legitimate governmental purpose. Without looking for more persuasive justifications for the deviation, a reviewing court cannot tell whether or not the deviant policy is grounded in animus or instead justified by public-regarding purposes. This, at any rate, is the “smoking out” rationale of strict scrutiny, which holds that strict scrutiny

---

<sup>269</sup> Id.

<sup>270</sup> See id. at 2693 (“In determining whether a law is motivated by an improper animus or purpose, discriminations of an un-usual character especially require careful consideration.”) (internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>271</sup> Id.

<sup>272</sup> Consider, for example, the Court’s argument in Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1996). There, in the course of holding that Congress lacked the ability to use its Article I powers to “commandeer” state or local law enforcement officials to enforce federal programs, Justice Scalia’s majority opinion argued that “if . . . earlier Congresses avoided use of this highly attractive power, we would have reason to believe that the power was thought not to exist.” Id. at 905. In reality, as Justice Stevens’s dissent explained, “[t]he Court’s evaluation of the historical evidence, furthermore, fails to acknowledge the important difference between policy decisions that may have been influenced by respect for state sovereignty concerns, and decisions that are compelled by the Constitution.” Id. at 952-53 (Stevens, J., joined by Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., dissenting). “Indeed, an entirely appropriate concern for the prerogatives of state government readily explains Congress’ sparing use of this otherwise ‘highly attractive’ . . . power. Congress’ discretion, contrary to the majority’s suggestion, indicates not that the power does not exist, but rather that the interests of the States are more than sufficiently protected by their participation in the National Government.” Id. at 953 n.12.

is necessary for courts to determine whether particular governmental uses of race are “compelling.”<sup>273</sup>

Of course, racial classifications receive strict scrutiny under current equal protection doctrine, and the Court has not specified the level of scrutiny applicable to sexual orientation discrimination.<sup>274</sup> As Justice Scalia notes in his Windsor dissent, the majority “opinion does not resolve and indeed does not even mention what had been the central question in this litigation: whether, under the Equal Protection Clause, laws restricting marriage to a man and a woman are reviewed for more than mere rationality.”<sup>275</sup> So, it may be that, if DOMA’s deviation from the historical exercises of governmental authority over marriage is relevant for the animus—or purpose-based reason just sketched, Windsor, may in the future, be best understood as employing a form of heightened scrutiny.<sup>276</sup>

C. Windsor and Interstate Recognition of Marriages

Among the marriage-related issues that Windsor does not expressly address is whether it is constitutional for a state to refuse to recognize a same-sex couple’s marriage from another state or country. This is distinct from the issue of whether a state must allow same-sex couples, which the next Section addresses. It is a question that, like <sup>277</sup>virtually all litigated constitutional issues, will ultimately not be answered solely by logic; rather, the meaning of Windsor for questions of interstate recognition will unfold with experience and time. But not necessarily a lot of time and experience. On July 11, 2013, fifteen days after the Supreme Court decided the marriage cases, Ohio residents James Obergefell and John Arthur flew to Maryland to be married, since Ohio law neither allows nor recognizes marriages of same-sex couples.<sup>278</sup> After

---

<sup>273</sup> See, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 226 (1995).

<sup>274</sup> Where discrimination against same-sex couples properly recognized as a form of sex discrimination, see, e.g., Andrew Koppelman, Why Discrimination Against Lesbians and Gay Men Is Sex Discrimination, 69 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 197 (1994); Andrew Koppelman, Defending the Sex Discrimination Argument for Gay Rights: A Reply to Edward Stein, 49 UCLA L. Rev. 519 (2001); Deborah A. Widiss, Elizabeth L. Rosenblatt & Douglas NeJaime, Exposing Sex Stereotypes in Recent Same-Sex Marriage Jurisprudence, 30 Harv. J.L. & Gender (2007), extant doctrine would call for heightened or intermediate scrutiny. See, e.g., United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 532-33 (1996).

<sup>275</sup> Windsor, at 2706 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>276</sup> Accord id. (“But the Court certainly does not apply anything that resembles that deferential framework [i.e., rational basis review].”).

<sup>277</sup> Cf. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., The Common Law 1 (1881) (“The life of the law has not been logic: it has been experience.”).

<sup>278</sup> Obergefell v. Kasich, No. 1:13-CV-501, 2013 WL 3814262, at *3 (S.D. Ohio July 22, 2013).

returning to Ohio, they filed suit against Ohio’s governor and other defendants on July 19.<sup>279</sup> Arthur is terminally ill,<sup>280</sup> and the suit seeks to ensure that the state would recognize their Maryland marriage when it came time to issue a death certificate, list Arthur’s marital status as “married,” and record Obergefell as his surviving spouse.<sup>281</sup> The ACLU has similar suits seeking to use equal protection to compel interstate recognition of valid marriages of same-sex couples, as well as an affirmative right to marry in the state, pending in New Mexico<sup>282</sup> and Pennsylvania.<sup>283</sup> On Obergefell and Arthur’s request for a temporary restraining order, the judge relied on Windsor to conclude that they showed a strong likelihood that they would prove that failure to recognize their marriage for purposes of the death certificate would violate equal protection.<sup>284</sup>

Unlike the federal government, state governments historically regulated marriage and decided, subject to constitutional restrictions, which marriages from other jurisdictions to recognize.<sup>285</sup> Therefore, the court could have distinguished Windsor on that basis. Instead, the judge concluded that Ohio’s action was in its own way unprecedented, much as the federal marriage exclusion in DOMA was unprecedented.<sup>286</sup> Historically, Ohio treated as valid any marriages that were valid where entered, even if Ohio would not itself let such a couple marry.<sup>287</sup> Thus, Ohio will recognize a different-sex marriage of a minor<sup>288</sup> or of first cousins.<sup>289</sup>

---

<sup>279</sup> Verified Complaint, Obergefell v. Kasich No. 1:13-CV-501, 2013 WL 3814262 (S.D. Ohio July 19, 2013), available at <http://www.scribd.com/doc/155109542/1-13-cv-00501-1>.

<sup>280</sup> See id. at 2 (characterizing Arthur as a “hospice patient” “suffer[ing] from debilitating ALS disease”); id. at 6 (noting that “John is likely to die soon”).

<sup>281</sup> Id. at 6.

<sup>282</sup> Complaint, Griego v. Oliver, No. D-202-CV-201302757 (N.M. Dist. Ct. Mar. 21, 2013), available at <https://www.aclu.org/lgbt-rights/griego-v-oliver>; see also Second Amended Complaint, Griego v. Oliver, No. D-202-CV-201302757 (N.M. Dist. Ct. Aug. 21, 2013).

<sup>283</sup> Complaint, Whitewood v. Corbett, No. XXX, (M.D. Pa. July 9, 2013); see also ACLU Seeks Freedom to Marry for Pennsylvania Couples, ACLU (July 9, 2013), <https://www.aclu.org/lgbt-rights/aclu-seeks-freedom-marry-pennsylvania-couples>.

<sup>284</sup> Obergefell v. Kasich, No. 1:13-CV-501, 2013 WL 3814262, at *4-5 *7 (S.D. Ohio July 22, 2013).

<sup>285</sup> See, e.g., United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, 2691 (2013); Obergefell, 2013 WL 3814262, at *5.

<sup>286</sup> See Obergefell v. Kasich, No. 1:13-CV-501, 2013 WL 3814262, at *4-6 (S.D. Ohio July 22, 2013).

<sup>287</sup> Obergefell, 2013 WL 3814262, at *5–*6.

<sup>288</sup> Id. at *5.

Apparently the only couples whose validly entered marriages it will not recognize are same-sex couples.<sup>290</sup> As with DOMA in Windsor, the court here said that the only purpose such discriminatory government action served was to impose inequality and make gay people unequal under law, an impermissible purpose, and it was therefore probably unconstitutional.<sup>291</sup>

This reasoning will not be persuasive to everyone. In his Windsor dissent, Chief Justice Roberts saw nothing suspicious in Congress generally accepting the validity of marriages approved by states even where states adopted different eligibility criteria, carving out an exception where the sex of the parties to a marriage was not to Congress's liking:

[N]one of those prior state-by-state variations [accepted by Congress] had involved differences over something—as the majority puts it—“thought of by most people as essential to the very definition of [marriage] and to its role and function throughout the history of civilization.” That the Federal Government treated this fundamental question differently than it treated variations over consanguinity or minimum age is hardly surprising . . . .<sup>292</sup>

Likewise, the National Review published commentary on the Obergefell ruling in which Ed Whelan jumps from Windsor's recognition that “[e]ach state as a sovereign has a rightful and legitimate concern in the marital status of persons domiciled within its borders”<sup>293</sup> to its supposed corollary “that a state, in determining which out-of-state marriages to recognize, has broad authority to regard some components of marriage as essential and others as incidental[,]”<sup>294</sup> to the conclusion that “[t]here is . . . no inconsistency between Ohio’s general practice of regarding age of consent and degrees of consanguinity as (within certain bounds) incidental and its view that the male-female component of marriage is essential.”<sup>295</sup> And absent any treatment of same-

---

<sup>289</sup> Id.

<sup>290</sup> See, e.g., id. at *4-*5; State Defendants’ Response in Opposition to Plaintiffs’ Motion for a Temporary Restraining Order, Obergefell, 2013 WL 3814262 (No. 1:13-CV-501), available at <http://www.buzzfeed.com/chrisgeidner/ohio-officials-ordered-to-recognize-gay-couples-marriage> (not identifying any class of marriages validly entered in other jurisdictions categorically denied recognition in Ohio other than those of same-sex couples).

<sup>291</sup> Obergefell, 2013 WL 3814262, at *6, available at <http://sblog.s3.amazonaws.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/07/Judge-Black-ruling-on-marriage-7-22.pdf>.

<sup>292</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S.Ct. 2675, 2696 (2013) (Roberts, J., dissenting).

<sup>293</sup> Id. at 2691 (quoting Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287, 298 (1942)).

<sup>294</sup> Ed Whelan, Federal-Court Ruling Against Ohio’s Marriage Laws, National Review Online, <http://www.nationalreview.com/bench-memos/354422/federal-court-ruling-against-ohios-marriage-laws-ed-whelan> (last visited Oct. 8, 2013).

<sup>295</sup> Id.

sex couples he would recognize as inconsistent, Whelan presumably sees nothing suspicious about Ohio's specifically targeted denial of recognition to same-sex couples' marriages.

Even some supporters of marriage equality have been critical of the district court's reasoning in Obergefell. Steve Sanders suggested that "[t]he opinion relied on a reading of [Windsor] that was probably too simplistic" and criticized the judge for reasoning from "a few soundbites from Windsor (taken out of the federalism context Justice Kennedy was careful to provide)."<sup>296</sup> Yet, unless one buys into an argument like Whelan's that marriages of same-sex couples somehow differ "essential[ly]" from marriages of different-sex couples (regardless of procreative capacity or lack thereof), Obergefell's reasoning about the unprecedentedness of Ohio's rule of non-recognition for same-sex couples' marriages from states that allow them is strong. It parallels Windsor's reasoning about the unprecedentedness of DOMA's rule of non-recognition for same-sex couple's marriages from states that allow them, though of course in a different legal context.

Sanders's bigger concern seems to be Obergefell's reliance on equal protection doctrine as opposed to substantive due process.<sup>297</sup> Sanders appears not to like use of equal protection here, to yield a requirement that Ohio recognize a Maryland marriage of a same-sex couple, because the same analysis would likely also yield a requirement that Ohio itself allow same-sex couples to marry civilly.<sup>298</sup> And, following incrementalist instincts, Sanders apparently would prefer courts in the position of this one to rely on doctrines that would be limited to interstate marriage recognition, not full-blown equal freedom to marry, until such time as the Supreme Court itself blesses the right to marry for same-sex couples.<sup>299</sup> Yet, even if Sanders were correct that it would be "a much deeper injury to your liberty, privacy and autonomy to have an existing marriage effectively taken away from you by a state that refuses to recognize it" than it is "to be denied the right to marry the person you choose,"<sup>300</sup> that would not mean that it is not also a

---

<sup>296</sup> Steve Sanders, A New Front for Marriage Equality: Recognizing Same-Sex Marriages from Other States, ACSBlog (July 31, 2013), <http://www.acslaw.org/acsblog/a-new-front-for-marriage-equality-recognizing-same-sex-marriages-from-other-states>.

<sup>297</sup> Id. ("But the biggest problem, I think, is Judge Black's use of equal protection as the basis for the decision."); id. ("I would locate constitutional protection for an existing marriage in substantive and procedural due process, not equal protection.").

<sup>298</sup><sup>298</sup> Id. ("If Judge Black is correct . . . , then it is hard to see why it isn't just as much of a problem for Ohio to refuse to license same-sex marriages on equal terms with heterosexual unions.")

<sup>299</sup> Id. ("[U]ntil the Supreme Court resolves the [question of gay marriage for the whole country, there are compelling reasons to distinguish between a right to get married and a separate right to remain married."].

<sup>300</sup> Id. I am far from convinced that State B's refusal to recognize a marriage from State A effectively takes away a couple's marriage. State A still recognizes it, as do marriage equality constitutional violation for a state to refuse to let two loving people marry because they are of the same-sex. So, it is not clear that litigation seeking recognition of a same-sex couple's marriage celebrated in another state ought to eschew constitutional doctrines that could yield a right to marry. Indeed, even Sanders's full law journal article on the subject concludes that at least if one accepts his due process liberty interest in having one's marriage recognized (which he takes as necessary for one to "remain married"), "a state that gives recognition to heterosexual marriages but denies it to same-sex marriages ends up with an equal protection problem."<sup>301</sup> That is what Obergefell concludes, and it is an eminently reasonable conclusion, consistent with, if not dictated by, Windsor.

D. Windsor and State Marriage Bans

Yet another marriage-related issue not expressly resolved by Windsor, perhaps the biggest, is whether or not it is constitutional for a state to refuse to let same-sex couples civilly marry in the first instance. Windsor was about whether the federal government recognized marriages of same-sex couples that states had chosen to allow. Indeed, the majority opinion in Windsor stated that "[t]his opinion and its holding are confined to those lawful marriages."<sup>302</sup> Chief Justice Roberts' dissent correctly parsed the reference to "those lawful marriages" to mean that the Court's conclusion was confined to the unconstitutionality of DOMA's discrimination against same-sex couples validly married by some state (or, presumably, in a foreign jurisdiction).<sup>303</sup> In his view, "[t]he Court [in Windsor] does not have before it, and the logic of its opinion does not decide, the distinct question whether the States, in the exercise of their 'historic states, as does the federal government and presumably the other jurisdictions in the world that have embraced marriage equality (all of which also calls into question Sanders's assessment of comparative badness). Granted, State B would not be treating the couple as married, which would have untoward consequences for the couple. Yet it is not self-evident that State A can with an administrative act such as marrying someone confer upon a couple a right to particular legal treatment by State B. For an examination of such concerns in the different context of state decisions about what sex a person is, see generally David B. Cruz, Sexual Judgments: Full Faith and Credit and the Relational Character of Legal Sex, 46 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 51 (2011).

---

<sup>301</sup> Steve Sanders, The Constitutional Right to (Keep Your) Same-Sex Marriage, 110 Mich. L. Rev. 1421, 1477 (2012).

<sup>302</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S.Ct. 2675, 2696 (2013).

<sup>303</sup> <sup>263</sup> Id. (Roberts, J., dissenting); cf. Respect for Marriage Act, H.R. 2523, 113th Cong. (2013), available at <http://thomas.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/z?c113:H.R.2523> ("For the purposes of any Federal law in which marital status is a factor, an individual shall be considered married if that individual's marriage is valid in the State where the marriage was entered into or, in the case of a marriage entered into outside any State, if the marriage is valid in the place where entered into and the marriage could have been entered into in a State."); S. 1236, 112th Cong. (2012).

and essential authority to define the marital relation,’ may continue to utilize the traditional definition of marriage.”<sup>304</sup>

In contrast, Justice Scalia dismissed the Windsor majority’s express limitation as a “bald, unreasoned disclaimer.”<sup>305</sup> In his view, it was “easy . . . indeed . . . inevitable” that a majority on the Supreme Court would in the future conclude that not only was DOMA Section 3 “motivated by [a] bare desire to harm” same-sex couples, but so too were “state laws denying same-sex couples marital status.”<sup>306</sup> Justice Scalia entertainingly, and perhaps helpfully from the perspective of supporters of marriage equality, provided redlining to show the modest changes to the majority opinion (in some cases, non-change) that would demonstrate the applicability of its reasoning to the question whether state refusal to let same-sex couples marry civilly violates the Equal Protection Clause.<sup>307</sup> While Scalia thought that state and lower federal courts could distinguish Windsor when confronted with such constitutional claims,<sup>308</sup> he was confident that the Supreme Court would not distinguish it, but rather would extend it: “As far as this Court is concerned, no one should be fooled; it is just a matter of listening and waiting for the other shoe.”<sup>309</sup>

If the other shoe drops in the future, as Scalia puts it, then perhaps the “federalism noises”<sup>310</sup> in the Court’s opinion in Windsor ultimately will appear not to have done much constitutional work.<sup>311</sup> This might be defended as an acceptable form of temporizing,<sup>312</sup> a way

---

<sup>304</sup> Windsor, at 2696 (Roberts, J., dissenting) (quoting majority opinion).

<sup>305</sup> Id. at 2709 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (internal quotation marks omitted). Chief Justice Roberts specifically rejected this characterization, maintaining that “the disclaimer is a logical and necessary consequence of the argument the majority has chosen to adopt.” Id. at 2697 (Roberts, J., dissenting).

<sup>306</sup> Id. (Scalia, J., dissenting) (some internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>307</sup> Id. at 2709-10.

<sup>308</sup> Id., at 2709.

<sup>309</sup> Id. at 2710.

<sup>310</sup> Id. at 2709 (“Lord, an opinion with such scatter-shot rationales as this one (federalism noises among them)

<sup>311</sup> Cf. John Hart Ely, Democracy And Distrust 7, 149-55 (1980) (arguing that immutability, as distinguished from judgments about relevance or invidiousness, ultimately does not do much work in equal protection doctrine).can be distinguished in many ways.”).

<sup>312</sup> Gallup Gay Marriage Poll Finds Majority Of U.S. Citizens Would Support Nationwide Marriage Equality Law, Huffington Post (July 31, 2013), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/07/31/gallup-gay-marriage-poll-\_n\_3682884.html.

for the Supreme Court to buy time before rendering a constitutional decision condemning the exclusion of same-sex couples from civil marriage, time during which, if recent history is a guide,<sup>313</sup> it appears likely that an even larger majority of the people of the country will come to support marriage equality. This is unlike the Supreme Court's making up what was and has been generally regarded as a lawless rationale for avoiding reaching the constitutionality of interracial marriage bans twelve years before Loving v. Virginia.<sup>314</sup> Here, in contrast, the Court in Windsor provided a rationale, persuasive to the majority Justices and to this author, for why Section 3 of DOMA was unconstitutional. If in a future case the Supreme Court relies on equal protection but without any amorphous federalism concerns to strike down state laws excluding same-sex couples from marriage, that need not mean that the Windsor opinion was disingenuous. It could simply demonstrate that the unconstitutionality of DOMA and other marriage laws discriminating against same-sex couples was overdetermined.<sup>315</sup>

Conclusion

In neither Hollingsworth v. Perry nor United States v. Windsor did the Supreme Court make any doctrinal splashes. Perry did extend Article III standing doctrine to hold that private parties who were not agents of the state and suffered no non-ideological injury of their own lacked standing to take appeals in federal court to defend state laws they support, even if they were responsible for qualifying the initiative that made the law. The Court's precedents arguably

---

<sup>313</sup> Gallup Gay Marriage Poll Finds Majority Of U.S. Citizens Would Support Nationwide Marriage Equality Law, Huffington Post (July 31, 2013), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/07/31/gallup-gay-marriage-poll-\_n\_3682884.html.

<sup>314</sup> Naim v. Naim, 350 U.S. 985 (1956), dismissed for lack of a federal question a mandatory appeal from a state court judgment upholding Virginia's antimiscegenation law after the state court was unresponsive to an earlier Supreme Court decision, 350 U.S. 891 (1955), that called for greater explanation of the state court's ruling. For description and critique of Naim, see David B. Cruz, Naim v. Naim, in Encyclopedia of Civil Liberties (Paul Finkelman ed., 2006), available at <http://american-civil-liberties.com/cases/4184-naim-v-naim-875-e-2nd-749-va-1955-350-us-891-1955-350-us-985-1956.html>; Richard Delgado, The Worst Supreme Court Case Ever?: Naim v. Naim, 12 Nev. L.J. 525 (2012); Marc Spindelman, Reorienting Bowers Hardwick, 79 N.C. L. Rev. 359, 446-53 (2001); Gerald Gunther, The Subtle Vices of the "Passive Virtues"—A Comment on Principle and Expediency in Judicial Review, 64 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 11-12 (1964); Herbert Wechsler, Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law, 73 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 34 (1959) (characterizing Supreme Court's action in Naim as based "on procedural grounds that . . . are wholly without basis in the law").

<sup>315</sup> Accord Larry Tribe, DOMA, Prop 8, and Justice Scalia's intemperate dissent, SCOTUSblog (June 26, 2013), <http://www.scotusblog.com/2013/06/doma-prop-8-and-justice-scalias-intemperate-dissent/> (concluding that, given Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the Court's decision in Windsor "if anything, . . . was over-determined, given the added federalism spin that propelled it").

did not squarely dictate an answer to the question whether initiative sponsors could, without more, be authorized by state law to defend their measures and thereby enjoy federal court standing.<sup>316</sup> Therefore, some extension of doctrine was necessary whatever way the Court was going to rule. But the Court's holding will have limited impact. Windsor did hold a federal statute unconstitutional because it denied lawfully married same-sex couples equal protection, but it did not resolve the question of what tier of equal protection scrutiny applies to sexual orientation discrimination, a basic doctrinal question that the Court has left open since its first decision addressing lesbian and gay people's equal protection rights almost two decades earlier in Romer v. Evans.<sup>317</sup> Nor did Windsor reach the question whether the fundamental constitutional right to marry extends to same-sex couples. For these reasons, it appears to be a modest case.

Yet, we should bear in mind Justice Souter's admonition that "[n]ot every epochal case has come in epochal trappings."<sup>318</sup> The Supreme Court's decisions in the marriage cases of its October 2012 term paved the way for the restoration of same-sex couple's freedom to marry in the nation's most populous state, California, home of almost one in eight people in the U.S., and certainly contributed to the swelling wave of marriage equality litigation across the land, something unfolding at a pace almost too fast to keep up with: lawsuits have been filed in "[a]t least fifteen states."<sup>319</sup> It may not be as inevitable as Justice Scalia's suggestion that "it is just a matter of listening and waiting" for "the second, state-law shoe to be dropped later, maybe next Term."<sup>320</sup> But with these decisions in conjunction with the growing support among the populace for same-sex couples' right to marry,<sup>321</sup> the Supreme Court has immeasurably helped this particular fight for "Equal Justice Under Law."

---

<sup>316</sup> But see Erwin Chemerinsky, Prop 8 Deserved a Defense, L.A. Times, June 28, 2013, <http://articles.latimes.com/2013/jun/28/opinion/la-oe-chemerinsky-proposition-8-initiatives-20130628> (opining that Perry standing holding "was clearly right as a matter of constitutional law").

<sup>317</sup> 517 U.S. 620 (1996).

<sup>318</sup> United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 615 (1995) (Souter, J., dissenting).

<sup>319</sup> Reid Wilson, Gay-marriage Backers Head to Court, Washington Post, Aug. 26, 2013, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/govbeat/wp/2013/08/26/gay-marriage-backers-head-to-court/>. See also Robert Barnes, Lawyers Olson and Boies Want Virginia as Same-sex Marriage Test Case, Washington Post, Sept. 29, 2013, http://www.washingtonpost.com/politics/lawyers-olson-and-boies-want-virginia-as-same-sex-marriage-test-case/2013/09/29/5309af60-282c-11e3-9256-41f018d21b49\_story.html (addressing "one of dozens of lawsuits filed across the nation by same-sex marriage activists who say they feel emboldened by the Supreme Court's decisions in June that overturned the federal Defense of Marriage Act").

<sup>320</sup> United States v. Windsor, 133 S.Ct. 2675, 2705, 2710 (2013) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>321</sup> See, e.g., Gallup Gay Marriage Poll Finds Majority Of U.S. Citizens Would Support Nationwide Marriage Equality Law, Huffington Post (July 31, 2013),

---

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/07/31/gallup-gay-marriage-poll-\_n\_3682884.html
(describing several nationwide polls showing majority support for same-sex couples' equal freedom to marry).