

Legal Doubletalk and the Concern with Positional Conflicts: A “Foolish Consistency”?

by Helen A. Anderson¹

Abstract:

This article explores the question whether lawyers should be able to argue both sides of a legal issue in unrelated cases. Today the ABA and many state bar associations caution against so-called “positional conflicts,” analyzing them as potential conflicts of interest under a multi-factor test. This relatively recent concern misses the real potential for harm: it is precisely when a lawyer decides not to make a contradictory argument for one client in order not to offend or harm another client that an ethical problem is likely to be present. A positional conflict is therefore evidence that any pressure to modify arguments has been overcome. In fact, a rule against positional conflicts only increases lawyers’ incentives to modify or drop arguments for the less-favored client. Thus, there should be no ethical prohibition against positional conflicts. On the other hand, a positional conflict may create credibility problems, despite the widely held professional ideals of independence and detachment. The positional conflict debate exposes fundamental ambivalence about lawyer sincerity, loyalty and independence. Eliminating a rule against positional conflicts will to some extent mitigate those credibility problems, but not entirely.

“A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of small minds.”²

“But it was my view that lawyers don't stand in the shoes of their clients and that good lawyers can give advice and argue any side of a case.”³

Anyone who has observed a law school moot court competition knows that a lawyer can argue both sides of an issue, and even argue both sides extremely well. In a moot court competition, teams of law students proceed through the contest arguing first one side, ¹ Assistant Professor, University of Washington School of Law. B.A. Carleton College, J.D. University of Washington. The author wishes to thank Professor Louis Wolcher, who provided extremely useful comments on an earlier draft. Many of my colleagues at the University of Washington offered valuable insights at a faculty colloquium I presented in October 2005. I am also grateful for the excellent assistance of my research assistant, Amy Orgain.

² Ralph Waldo Emerson, Self-Reliance, in ESSAYS (1841).

³ Confirmation Hearing on the Nomination of John G. Roberts, Jr. to be Chief Justice of the United States, 109th Cong. 158 (September 13, 2005) (Roberts was discussing his pro bono work).

then the other, of a case. Often these contradictory arguments are within hours of each other. The contestants suffer no loss of credibility for their side-switching.

In the practice of law, of course, conflict of interest rules prevent lawyers from being on both sides of the same case. But should lawyers be allowed to take contradictory legal positions in unrelated cases? Although there is concern about such “positional conflicts” today, in 1872 the answer was yes. Lawyer and Senator Matthew Hale Carpenter argued contradictory interpretations of the Fourteenth Amendment’s privileges and immunities clause to the Supreme Court in two famous cases. Carpenter represented a woman denied admission to the bar in *Bradwell v. Illinois*⁴ and in *the Slaughter-House Cases*⁵ he argued for the state of Louisiana, defending its grant of a butchering monopoly. In Bradwell, Carpenter argued that the privileges and immunities clause protected his client’s right to pursue an avocation in law. In the Slaughterhouse Cases, he argued that the clause did not protect a citizen’s right to work in the butchering industry, and did not limit the state’s authority to restrict admission into particular avocations.⁶ The arguments were

⁴ 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130(1873).

⁵ 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873).

⁶ Senator Hale argued first in the Bradwell case that the “privileges and immunities” protected by the 14th amendment (then only 5 years old) included the right to pursue all avocations. While he conceded the state had the authority to prescribe qualifications for a profession, he argued that it could not exclude an entire class of citizens from any avocation. 21 L.Ed. 2d 442, 444. (The Lawyer’s Edition reporter of the Supreme Court decisions includes the arguments of counsel). “I maintain that the 14th Amendment opens to every citizen of the United States, male or female, black or white, married or single, the honorable professions as well as the servile employments of life; and that no citizen can be excluded from any; one of them.” Id.

Yet in the Slaughterhouse cases, only two weeks later, he argued that the privileges and immunities clause of the 14th Amendment did not impair the authority of Louisiana to grant one company the exclusive right to sell and butcher animals for food in a certain area. Hale argued, “The privileges and immunities here contemplated are those which are fundamental, as, for instance the right of going into any state for the purpose of residing therein; the right of taking up one’s residence therein, and becoming a citizen; the right of free entrance and exit, and passage through; the protection of the laws affecting personal liberty.” 21 L.Ed. 394, 402.

The conflict seems clear. In maintaining in Bradwell that the privileges and immunities protected by the 14th Amendment included professions and avocations, he undermined the argument that the state had the authority to exclude certain citizens from the avocation of butchering. In addition, Hale’s eagerness to show that the court could decide for Bradwell without granting women the right to vote ended up cutting against his argument in the Slaughterhouse cases that the privileges and immunities of the 14th Amendment included only those that were “fundamental” such as the right to travel. (Surely the right to vote is a fundamental privilege of citizenship). One can imagine ways to reconcile the arguments in the two cases, but the need for such reconciliation is further evidence of the conflict. At any rate, the conflict was made even clearer when Hale won the Slaughterhouse Cases, but lost Bradwell, and when the decision in Bradwell cited heavily his victory in the Slaughterhouse Cases.

within weeks of each other. Carpenter prevailed in the Slaughterhouse Cases but lost in Bradwell. The Bradwell decision relied almost exclusively on the precedent set in the Slaughter-House Cases one day earlier.⁷

Carpenter's contradictory legal positions before the same court were not seen as an ethical problem at the time; in fact, the cases brought him fame and a thriving Supreme Court practice.⁸ Carpenter's actions were consistent with the lawyerly ideals of independence, detachment and professionalism. Yet under the rules prevalent in most American jurisdictions today, Carpenter's dual representations would be seen as a conflict of interest and therefore an ethical violation.

Since an ethical concern with legal positional conflicts was raised in the 1983 comments to the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, legal authorities have analyzed positional conflicts as potential conflicts of interest. According to most authorities today, a positional conflict is not a per se ethical violation, but may become a conflict of interest if the issue is important enough to the clients and there is a risk that one representation will materially limit the other; for example, by leading to precedent from one case that will adversely control the other (as was true with Senator Carpenter's cases).⁹

Positional conflicts are rarely the subject of litigation and there are few published cases on the subject. It is the author's belief that lawyers suppress most positional conflicts and that business conflicts are the greater force. Business conflicts are not necessarily ethical code violations, but the term used to describe economic pressures lawyers face to favor one case over another. For example, one client may provide repeat business so that a

Hale was paid for his representation in the Slaughterhouse cases, but took on Myra Bradwell's case pro bono. See Jane M. Friedman, Myra Bradwell: On Defying the Creator and Becoming a Lawyer, 28 VAPPARAISO UNIV. L. REV. 1287, 1293-97 (1994).

⁷ 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130, 139 (1873).

⁸ E. BRUCE THOMPSON, MATTHEW HALE CARPENTER: WEBSTER OF THE WEST 103 (1954). "His courage in the conduct of a cause was the sublimity of heroism, and his fidelity to his clients was never open to suspicion." MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF MATTHEW H. CARPENTER 70 (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1882).

⁹ See section III, infra.

lawyer does not want to offend it by taking on a case or making an argument that client disapproves of.

The presence of a positional conflict is actually evidence that a business conflict may have been overcome. It is when a lawyer decides not to make a contrary argument for one client in order not to offend or harm another client that an ethical problem is likely to be present. The real ethical concern should be the way in which a lawyer's interest in, loyalty to, or dependence on, a particular client may limit the representation of other clients. Too much focus on a rule against positional conflicts creates incentives for lawyers to avoid the positional conflict by bowing to business conflicts and suppressing arguments for or dropping the less favored client. There is some evidence that that is exactly what has happened in many law practices, and that evidence may explain why there are so few cases raising the question of positional conflicts. Thus, an ethical rule against positional conflicts seems counterproductive.

Even for lawyers who practice without business conflicts, (e.g., public defenders or legal services lawyers), a rule against positional conflicts does not help clients. An excessive concern with avoiding positional conflicts in these kinds of cases could lead to unnecessary withdrawal of quality counsel, who are generally scarce.¹⁰

At the same time, positional conflicts can raise serious attorney credibility questions. Depending on the importance of the issue to both cases, and the proximity of the arguments in time and place, the lawyer presenting conflicting legal arguments may face credibility problems with clients, the court(s) and the public

Underlying this credibility concern is ambivalence in the profession about lawyer sincerity. According to the traditional "cab rank" view of law practice, a lawyer honorably takes the position of whatever client jumps in his cab.¹¹ Under this view, a lawyer is an independent professional who does not necessarily endorse the viewpoints or goals of his or her clients, but nevertheless makes the best arguments possible for them. It is this view of the profession that permeates the Model Rules and most legal authorities.

¹⁰ACLU OF WA REPORT ON INDIGENT DEFENSE (2004), <http://www.aclu.org/FilesPDFs/indigentdefenserpt.pdf>; Deborah Rhode, Essay: The Pro Bono Responsibilities of Lawyers and Law Students, 27 Wm. Mitchell L. Rev. 1563 (2002).

¹¹ See, e.g., Philadelphia Ethics Opinion 89-27 at 2.

But even under the traditional “independent” view of the profession, a positional conflict presents credibility problems, suggesting that lawyers and judges hold simultaneous contradictory ideas about the lawyer’s role. Under the traditional view, advocates usually choose their positions not because they believe in them but because these positions best serve their clients. We also know that many lawyers would represent either side of a controversy and take the first client who approaches them. Lawyers who do so suffer no loss in credibility. Why then should their credibility be diminished if they argue a contrary position in an unrelated case? This concern about credibility cannot be simply reasoned away—there is something about the lawyer’s performance that demands at least a semblance of loyalty to the argument. A lawyer who argues on both sides of an issue may have difficulty establishing a persuasive character or ethos. Nevertheless, eliminating an ethical rule against positional conflicts, and making clear that a lawyer can argue both sides of a question ethically, will greatly reduce these credibility problems.

This article argues that a legal positional conflict is not a true conflict of interest, and should not be the subject of an ethical prohibition. Because of the incentives it creates, a rule against positional conflicts simply gives greater control to wealthy clients over the availability of legal services without significantly protecting the rights of poor or middle income clients. Business conflicts already exert significant pressure on lawyers; too much concern with potential positional conflicts only increases that pressure.

This article further argues that eliminating an ethical prohibition against positional conflicts could mitigate much of the credibility concerns raised by contradictory legal arguments. But even if the profession fully endorsed the ethic of independence and eliminated a rule against positional conflicts, some credibility problems would inevitably remain. Thus, while there should be no rule against positional conflicts, a court should respect an attorney's decision to withdraw because of credibility concerns.

Part I of this article defines a legal positional conflict, and explains the distinction between legal and factual positional conflicts. Part II covers the historical evolution of the ABA position on positional conflicts while Part III describes the approaches taken by the Restatement on the Law of Lawyering, caselaw, state ethics opinions and state ethical codes. Part IV critiques the predominant analysis of positional conflicts as potential conflicts of interest, on the grounds that it exacerbates business conflicts and creates harmful incentives. This section also acknowledges the credibility concerns with positional conflicts, and illustrates the operation of a positional conflict with the example of a public defender. Part V sets forth a proposal to amend the comments to Model Rule 1.7.

I. What is a Positional or Issue Conflict?

The American Bar Association defines the question of positional or issue conflicts as “whether a lawyer can represent a client with respect to a substantive legal issue when the lawyer knows that the client’s position on that issue is directly contrary to the position being urged by the lawyer (or the lawyer’s firm) on behalf of another client in a different, and unrelated pending matter.”¹² A seminal article on the topic states: “A positional conflict of interest occurs when a law firm adopts a legal position for one client seeking a particular legal result that is directly contrary to the position taken on behalf of another present or former client, seeking an opposite legal result, in a completely unrelated matter.”¹³

In a positional conflict, because the matters and parties are unrelated, there would be no conflict of interest but for the contrary arguments the lawyer asserts.¹⁴ If a positional ¹² ABA Comm. On Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 93-377 at 1 (1993).

¹³ John S. Dzienkowski, Positional Conflicts of Interest, 71 TEX. L. REV. 457, 460 (1993).

¹⁴ The Model Rules of Professional Conduct 1.7(a) provides that a concurrent conflict of interest exists if: “(1) the representation of one client will be directly adverse to another client; or (2) there is a significant conflict is to rise to the level of a conflict of interest, it will be because it creates a “significant risk that the representation of [a] client will be materially limited” by the lawyer’s opposing arguments in an unrelated matter.¹⁵ If there is a conflict of interest, then the attorney and the attorney’s firm may not represent both clients, unless the clients give reasonable, informed consent.¹⁶ If an attorney with a conflict of interest continues with both representations absent such consent, he or she may be subject to a disqualification motion and/or disciplinary proceedings.¹⁷ A conflict of interest may also support a malpractice action by showing a breach of the standard of care.¹⁸ Thus, whether a positional conflict constitutes a conflict of interest under the ethical rules is a critical question.

Sometimes lawyers and others use the term “positional conflict” to describe what is really a business conflict¹⁹ that will never ripen into a positional conflict. For example, in one survey, lawyers in different firms repeatedly used the term to refer to a problem in accepting clients or cases that more valuable clients would object to, regardless of whether such representation would entail making arguments that actually conflict with arguments made on behalf of these valuable clients.²⁰ In a case that made the front page of the New York Times, a large law firm withdrew from pro bono representation of New York City against gun manufacturers because of, in the words of a firm statement, risk that the representation of one or more clients will be materially limited by the lawyer’s responsibilities to another client, a former client or a third person or by a personal interest of the lawyer.” Subsection (1) does not apply to a positional conflict because it refers to situations where the attorney is proceeding directly against one client on behalf of another client. MODEL RULES OF PROF’L CONDUCT R. 1.7 cmt. 6 (2004).

¹⁵ MODEL RULES OF PROF’L CONDUCT R. 1.7(a)(2) (2004).

¹⁶ MODEL RULES OF PROF’L CONDUCT R. 1.7(b)(4) (2004).

¹⁷ MODEL RULES OF PROF’L CONDUCT 8.4, cmt. 1 (2004).

¹⁸ RONALD D. ROTUNDA, LEGAL ETHICS – THE LAWYER’S DESKBOOK ON PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY § 1.7-2(b) (American Bar Association, 2002).

¹⁹ A business conflict does not usually rise to the level of an ethical violation. Business conflicts have been defined as “not a properly disqualifying conflict of interest, but merely the risk of loss of business from having a firm member be perceived to adopt a policy position that one of the firm’s clients might not like.” Robert W. Gordon, The Independence of Lawyers, 68 B.U.L. REV. 1, 61-62 (1988) (citing MODEL CODE OF PROF’L RESPONSIBILITY EC 7-17 (1981)). Gordon adds, “What is especially interesting about such prohibitions is not so much that partners impose them, but that the partners are so unembarrassed about doing so, even though the practice violates—in addition to the formal provisions of some codes of ethics—every conceivable traditional ideal of independence their profession has ever entertained.” Id.

²⁰ Susan P. Shapiro, Everests of the Mundane: Conflict of Interest in Real-World Legal Practice, 69 FORDHAM L. REV. 1139, 1166-1168 (2000)

“certain potential ‘positional conflicts’ involving the position of longterm existing clients and those being advanced in the gun case.”²¹ Legal experts commented, however, that the firm really faced economic pressure, rather than an ethical problem.²² The firm was not actually faced with taking contrary positions, just the disapproval of powerful clients.²³ Use of the term ‘positional conflict’ to cover business conflicts is confusing, and actually lumps together situations where lawyers argue conflicting positions on behalf of different clients, and situations where lawyers refuse to make the conflicting arguments or suppress the problem for economic reasons. When the term “positional conflict” is used in this article, it refers to the former situation. Of course, a true positional conflict may exist together with—or cause—a business conflict, but it may also occur without any significant conflicting economic pressure on the attorney.

This article is concerned with positional conflicts arising from legal, not factual, arguments.²⁴ Examples of legal positional conflicts are: arguing for one client that the Federal Sentencing Guidelines are constitutional, while arguing for another client that the Guidelines are unconstitutional,²⁵ arguing that jury recommendations in a capital case are entitled to great weight in one case, and arguing in another case that such recommendations are not entitled to great weight.²⁶ An example of a factual positional conflict is arguing in one case that the United States uranium market is competitive, while arguing in another that it is not.²⁷

²¹ Top Law Firm Withdraws from City’s Gun Suit, N.Y. Times, April 17, 2004 at A1, A17.

²² Id. The firm may have wished to make their withdrawal look motivated by ethical rather than business considerations.

²³ Another firm in a high-profile case used the term “positional conflict” to describe a situation where one client asked the firm to withdraw from a case in which it was appealing to the Supreme Court an appellate decision that was favorable precedent for the client in another case in which the firm was not involved. See, e.g., Jonathan Ringel, Conflict Gives Bork a Starr Turn: Kirkland & Ellis forced to give up role in Festo, LEGAL TIMES, Apr. 16, 2001, at 6. This situation is more accurately labeled a business conflict, since the firm was not making conflicting legal arguments, only one argument that another client did not like.

²⁴ Of course, the line between fact and law is notoriously difficult to draw at times. See, e.g., Randall H. Warner, All Mixed Up About Mixed Questions, 7 J. OF APP. PRAC. & PROCESS 101 (2005).

²⁵ Federal Defenders of San Diego Inc. v. United States Sentencing Commission, infra note 101.

²⁶ State v. Williams, infra note 96.

²⁷ See Westinghouse, infra note 90. The court did not find a factual positional conflict, but ruled on other grounds.

This article is concerned primarily with legal, rather than factual, positional conflicts because a factual positional conflict is more likely to meet the definition of a conflict of interest even without a special rule against positional conflicts. A factual overlap in two cases is more likely to mean that the cases are indeed related,²⁸ will likely involve attacking and defending the same evidence and witnesses, and present the danger of misusing confidential information from one case to disadvantage that client.²⁹ To the extent a factual conflict does not create a clear conflict of interest because of the factual overlap, it may raise the same ethical issues as a pure legal positional conflict. It is difficult to separate fact from law, and legal arguments are tightly entwined with and dependent upon characterizations of the facts.³⁰

The classic example of a factual positional conflict is Fiandaca v. Cunningham,³¹ where New Hampshire Legal Assistance represented two class clients: mentally retarded citizens and women prisoners. When the state offered to settle the prisoner litigation by offering a facility already being used for the mentally retarded, the previously unrelated lawsuits became related and the NHLA found itself unable to advocate two different uses of the same facility. Had the lawyers agreed to the settlement offer, the settlement would have had a direct and immediate impact on their other class clients. And, as with any factual conflict, there would be the danger of misusing a client's confidential information, another basis for finding a conflict of interest.³²

A positional conflict of interest can arise in a litigation, transactional or lobbying context, or some combination thereof.³³ The litigation context is the paradigm example, because there the lawyer is asserting two contrary legal arguments as correct. The lobbying

²⁸ Rotunda, supra note 18, at § 8-6.14.5.

²⁹ SEE MODEL CODE OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 1.8(b), 3.3, 3.4 (2004). By a factual conflict I mean a conflict about what the facts are (e.g., what happened, who is telling the truth), rather than a conflict about the significance or characterization of similar facts (e.g., whether a shoe is a deadly weapon).

³⁰ Louis E. Wolcher, Pavcnik's Theory of Legal Decisionmaking: An Introduction, 72 WASH. L. REV. 469, 472-73 (1997).

³¹ 827 F.2d 825 (1st Cir. 1987), discussed in Rotunda, supra, note 18, at § 8-6.14.5.

³² See MODEL CODE OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 1.8(b) (2004); See also Westinghouse, infra note 90, where the firm's conflicting positions on the competitiveness of the uranium industry created a factual positional conflict and the danger of misusing confidential information.

³³ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 464. Dzienkowski first identified these three categories of conflicts, but used the litigation positional conflict as the "model for analyzing all positional conflicts of interest." Id.

context presents similar concerns where the lawyer asserts conflicting positions about what the law should be. In a transactional context, the lawyer may be advising clients to take a position or course of action as a tactical matter and can explain the risks—thus, where both matters are transactional there is little real conflict.³⁴ But where one matter is transactional and the other is litigational, a serious positional conflict can develop. In the litigation matter the lawyer may advocate a position that undercuts the position the lawyer helped the transactional client to take.³⁵ The present analysis will focus primarily on positional conflicts in a litigation context because it is the “paradigm example” and brings into focus the debates about lawyer sincerity and loyalty.

The most troublesome aspect of defining positional conflicts is determining when arguments conflict. Not every contrary legal position constitutes a positional conflict: some are innocuous. “[L]awyers take contrary legal positions all the time. They sometimes take conflicting legal positions in the same case.”³⁶ For example, a lawyer may argue in one case that legislative intent is a proper source of statutory interpretation even where the text is clear, but in another case urge the court not to look beyond the plain text of the statute despite clear evidence of a different statutory intent. Such a “conflict” would not strike most lawyers as noteworthy; in fact a lawyer who stubbornly stuck to one view of statutory interpretation in every representation, no matter what the result for the client, would be viewed as inept.³⁷ Whether conflicting arguments rise to the level of a positional conflict will depend at least in part on how important the issues are to each representation.³⁸ Some argue that positional conflicts can only arise with substantive, as opposed to procedural, legal arguments;³⁹ although the line between substance and procedure is tricky to draw, and some “procedural” issues can be of great

³⁴ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 467

³⁵ See discussion of conflict of interest involving the law firm of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 468.

³⁶ Rotunda, supra note 18, at § 8-6.14.4.

³⁷ See e.g. NORMAN J. SINGER, SUTHERLAND STATUTES AND STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION chp. 45 (2004).

³⁸ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 509.

³⁹ See Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 484, n. 219-220; ABA Comm. On Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 93-377, n.1 (1993).

significance to the clients.⁴⁰ The difficulty in distinguishing between innocuous and significant positional conflicts is one argument against requiring lawyers to avoid them.⁴¹

Most authorities say that a conflict with a position taken on behalf of a former client raises no ethical concerns—that a positional conflict can only arise between concurrent clients.⁴² If the former representation has concluded, then, especially in the litigation context, the lawyer’s subsequent representation can do no harm to the former client’s case. Provided that the former and current representations do not run afoul of other ethical prohibitions, a lawyer is free to change positions or clients over time.⁴³ Were this not the case, lawyers would have difficulty changing their practice and, for example, moving from defense work to plaintiff’s work in a particular area.

The prevalence of positional conflicts is difficult to gauge. Some sources suggest that lawyers commonly practice with positional conflicts; that arguing different sides of the same legal issue is part of everyday lawyering. Ethics opinions from California, Philadelphia, and New York state that positional conflicts are common.⁴⁴ One commentator seems to accept that “It is the job of the lawyer to argue in one way for client A on Monday and in the opposite way for client B on Tuesday.”⁴⁵ An article in a family law journal states that divorce lawyers commonly represent both husbands and ⁴⁰ See, e.g., Sibbach v. Wilson, 312 U.S. 655 (1941) (whether plaintiff could be found in contempt for refusing to submit to a physical examination was a matter of procedure).

⁴¹ See Part III (C), infra.

⁴² See discussion of ABA Comm. On Ethics and Prof’l Responsibility, Formal Op. 93-377 (1993), infra; But see Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at note 44.

⁴³ Dzienkowski notes that an exception might arise where the former client is a repeat player whom the lawyer expects to represent again. Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 496. In such a situation, the former client might be considered more of a continuing client than a former client. Dzienkowski also notes that a lawyer switching sides on an issue might have credibility problems with the court. Id., at 497., and that transactional lawyers who develop contractual provisions for clients should not be able to attack those provisions later even in unrelated cases. Id. at 530-531. But he concludes that limitations on successive positional conflicts should be limited: “To give former clients a right to prevent lawyer s from taking different positions in the future would give the past too much of a claim on the future.” Id., at 498.

⁴⁴ The California committee stated that positional conflicts are “common and prolific in our adversarial system of justice.” California Ethics Opinion no. 1989-108 at 3. The Philadelphia opinion states that “Practices throughout the country all have lawyers who go into court on one day and argue an interpretation of the law for custody for a mother and the next day go into a different court in a different case and argue a different interpretation for a father. This is the essence of what a lawyer does.” Philadelphia Ethics Opinion 89-27 at 2. The Maine opinion, on the other hand, says positional conflicts are rare (perhaps meaning consequential conflicts). Maine Ethics Opinion. No. 155 (1997) at 4.

⁴⁵ J.M. Balkin, Ideological Drift and the Struggle Over Meaning, 25 CONN. L. REV. 869, 887 (1993).

wives, as well as other family members or interested parties so that “it is common for divorce lawyers to represent clients with antagonistic legal, as distinguished from factual, positions.”⁴⁶ Arguments against requiring firms to screen for positional conflicts often assume that such conflicts are numerous, if mostly insignificant.

Yet other sources suggest that while lawyers often feel the pressure of potential positional conflicts, they frequently resolve the problem by not undertaking the second representation—in other words, the positional conflict never materializes.⁴⁷ In an age of increasing competition and specialization, many lawyers have abandoned the cab rank view and instead practice on one side of an area, thereby avoiding many significant positional conflicts and keeping their clients happy. Certainly there is very little litigation over positional conflicts.

It may be that these seemingly contradictory observations about the prevalence of positional conflicts can be reconciled by distinguishing between minor positional conflicts over less important legal issues (of which there are many) and major positional conflicts over issues of great significance to the parties (of which there are few). It may also be that lawyer independence and the prevalence of positional conflicts varies with practice types and legal communities.

II. Historical context and the evolution of the ABA position on positional conflicts

⁴⁶ David Walther and Anne Kass, Positional Conflict: Considering a One-Side-Representation Rule, 13 AMERICAN JOURNAL OF FAMILY LAW 137 (1999).

⁴⁷ Spaulding, infra note 159, and Shapiro, supra note 20, at 1166. These sources contain interviews with lawyers indicating that fear of alienating important clients causes them to reject cases that would require arguing against these clients’ institutional interests. For example, during one of Shapiro’s interviews, the managing partner of a large Philadelphia law firm observed, “My theory is that, of every three phone calls I get, I get to take one on as a client. I’ve always said that somebody could have a law firm about the size of [this firm] just taking on our conflicted representations.” Id. at n.16. See also, Robert R. Kuehn, Shooting the Messenger: The Ethics of Attacks on Environmental Representation, 26 HARV. ENVTL. L. REV. 417, 426 n. 44 (2002).

Although lawyers' conflicts of interest have been the subject of regulation since medieval times,⁴⁸ there is little if any discussion of positional conflicts of interest before the adoption of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct in 1983. Neither the 1908 Canons of Professional Ethics nor the 1969 Model Code of Professional Conduct mentioned the issue, except arguably in the general prohibitions of conflicts of interest,⁴⁹ and in the pro bono context by allowing lawyers to advocate law reform contrary to the interest or desires of a client.⁵⁰ One commentator has suggested that broad language in Canon 6⁵¹ of the 1908 Canons caused positional conflicts to be "given an overly zealous application,"⁵² but there is little evidence of that zeal in the caselaw or other written record.⁵³ According to Professor Hazard, "the traditional concept of the advocate's role did not recognize positional conflicts as worthy of serious concern."⁵⁴ This traditional concept included a "fierce insistence" on a lawyer's independence and to the "so-called cab rank rule."⁵⁵ Senator Carpenter's dual representation in the 1872 Supreme Court supports Hazard's conclusion.⁵⁶ The English bar, always more committed to the cab rank rule than American lawyers, had historical examples of lawyers arguing whatever ⁴⁸ As early as 1280, a London Ordinance forbade attorneys from representing adverse parties in the same action and from dropping one client to represent another in the same case. Jonathan Rose, The Ambidextrous Lawyer: Conflict of Interest and the Medieval and Early Modern Legal Profession, 7 U. CHI. L. SCH. ROUNDTABLE 137, 146-147 (2000)).

⁴⁹ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 469.

⁵⁰ MODEL CODE OF PROF'L RESPONSIBILITY EC 7-17 (1980); See Rotunda, supra note 19, at § 8-6.14.2. The law reform provision addresses positions a lawyer might take not in his capacity as a legal representative, and does not focus on situations where the lawyer takes contrary legal positions for different clients. See also MODEL CODE OF PROF'L RESPONSIBILITY R. 6.3, 6.4 (2004), allowing lawyers to serve as directors, officers or members of law reform organizations without creating a lawyer-client relationship. Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 531-536, discusses positional conflicts in the context of a lawyer's personal law reform activities.

⁵¹ Canon 6 defined a conflict to include "when, in behalf of one client, it is [the lawyer's] duty to contend for that which duty to another client requires him to oppose." CHARLES W. WOLFRAM, MODERN LEGAL ETHICS § 7.3 (1986); MODEL CODE OF PROF'L RESPONSIBILITY, Canon 6 (1908).

⁵² Wolfram, supra note 51. Professor Dzienkowski notes that this assertion was not supported by specific examples other than the case of Estates Theatres, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 345 F.Supp. 93 (S.D.N.Y. 1972). Dzienkowski, supra note 13 at n.47.

⁵³ Dzienkowski notes a 1981 Legal Ethics Forum in which the participants discussed what appeared to be a hypothetical positional conflict (without naming it as such), but notes the participants seemed most concerned about the positional conflict developing into a standard conflict of interest if the two clients ended up on opposite sides of a lawsuit. Dzienkowski, supra note 13 at n. 49 (discussing Legal Ethics Forum, 67 A.B.A.J. 1692 (1981)).

⁵⁴ GEOFFERY C. HAZARD, JR., W. WILLIAM HODES, JOHN S. DZIENKOWSKI, THE LAW OF LAWYERING §10.10 (2004 Supp.)

⁵⁵ Id.

⁵⁶ See note 6, supra.

position was assigned them—including trial lawyers who traveled with judges and took sides as needed.⁵⁷

Before the ABA’s first express statement on positional conflicts in 1983, the American legal profession underwent significant changes. The end of the nineteenth century was a time of increasing professionalism for lawyers, as legal education evolved under Christopher Langdell.⁵⁸ Bar associations formed and erected barriers to entry through educational and bar examination requirements.⁵⁹ The lawyer to population ratio thus remained relatively stable until the 1970’s, when law schools “nearly doubled their enrollments.”⁶⁰ During the first half of the century, the overwhelming majority of lawyers were in private practice, and most lawyers practiced solo.⁶¹

Beginning in the 70’s, the traditional barriers to entry ceased to keep down the number of new lawyers. Between 1951 and 1995, the number of lawyers increased more than fourfold.⁶² Between 1960 and 1995, the lawyer to population ration went from 1: 627 to 1:307. The number and percentage of lawyers working for the government increased significantly, and the percentage of solo practitioners went from 61.2 in 1948 to 33.2 in 1988.⁶³ More and more lawyers are employees rather than independent professionals.⁶⁴ The increase in lawyers has been accompanied by an increase in competition and specialization. At the same time, lawyers are practicing in ever larger groups, as the number and size of large private firms has grown.⁶⁵ Within these large firms, lawyers are ⁵⁷ See Shaffer, infra note 175 at n.14 (citing Geoffrey C. Hazard, A Historical Perspective on the Attorney-Client Privilege, 66 CAL. L. REV. 1061, 1071 (1978)). Shaffer argues that American lawyers were always more identified with their clients than English lawyers, who maintained more independence—and that an ethic of independence (or separation from client) grew up later. Id.

⁵⁸ Philip Gaines, The “True Lawyer” in America: Discursive Construction of the Legal Profession in the Nineteenth Century, 45 AM. J. LEGAL HIST. 132, 133, 152-153 (2001).

⁵⁹ Richard L. Abel, The Transformation of the American Legal Profession, 20 LAW & SOC’Y REV. 7, 9 (1986).

⁶⁰ Robert W. Gordon, The Legal Profession, in LOOKING BACK AT LAW’S CENTURY 292 (Austin Sarat, Bryant Garth, and Robert A. Kagan, eds., 2002); Abel, supra note 59, at 9.

⁶¹ LAWRENCE FRIEDMAN, AMERICAN LAW IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY 461-62 (Yale University Press, 2002)

⁶² Id. at 457.

⁶³ Gordon supra note 60, at 293.

⁶⁴ Abel supra note 59, at 16.

⁶⁵ Friedman, supra note 61, at 462. In the late 50’s, there were only 38 firms with more than 50 lawyers. In 1995 there were 702, and the largest, Baker & McKenzie, had 1,754. Id.

increasingly segregated by areas of substantive expertise.⁶⁶ Thus, the typical lawyer's employment changed from a solo, general practice to employment by a large institution, government agency, or firm. The typical lawyer was no longer a general practitioner, but likely to be a specialist on one side of a class of cases. A rule against positional conflicts is consistent with such specialization.

Along with the enormous growth and specialization of the legal profession that occurred between Senator Carpenter's time and the 1983 Model Code, there was a significant shift in the profession's understanding of the law and how it worked. The predominant view of law in the Nineteenth Century was a belief in natural law giving way later to a classical view of law as the objective application of known principles.⁶⁷ Thus judges were viewed as constrained by rules, rules that could be determined correctly through reason.⁶⁸ This objective conception of law gave way in the early twentieth century to legal realism. The legal realists, whose influence persists, attacked legal objectivity and formalism as a facade. They argued that "rules are malleable," that law is never neutral but inextricably bound up with politics.⁶⁹ This realist view gradually gained hold with the bar at large and today its central tenets are considered unremarkable.⁷⁰ The change in the predominant view of the working of the law is also consistent with a change in the attitude toward positional conflicts.⁷¹

⁶⁶ John P. Heinz, Edward O. Laumann, Robert L. Nelson, Ethan Michelson, The Changing Character of Lawyers' Work: Chicago in 1975 and 1995, 32 LAW & SOC'Y REV. 751, 759-60 (1998). This article compares characteristics of law practice in Chicago based on surveys in 1975 and 1995. The 1975 study showed a bar divided by prestige between corporate lawyers and those who served individuals. In 1995 the division was more complicated due to increased specialization and competition.

⁶⁷ Elizabeth Mensch, The History of Mainstream Legal Thought, in THE POLITICS OF LAW: A PROGRESSIVE CRITIQUE 19-26 (David Kairys, ed., 1982). As Mensch explains, these predominant views were complicated and always evolving.

⁶⁸ Id. at 24.

⁶⁹ See Friedman, supra note 61, at 489-497; Mensch supra note 67, at 26-29.

⁷⁰ Friedman, supra note 61, at 493.

⁷¹ Under the earlier view of the law as objective, a lawyer's role in the creation of law would be considered minimal, and a purely legal positional conflict would not be thought likely to affect the outcome of either case. After the legal realist view had pervaded the bar, with a sense of the indeterminacy of law and outcomes, it makes sense that the lawyer's role in the creation of law would be seen as greater. Strategic choices about arguments are seen as critical when there is no objectively correct outcome to be found through the exercise of judicial reason. Lawyers and judges together create the law. Under this view, a lawyer arguing two sides of a legal question has the potential to do more harm to one of her clients, than would a lawyer who, under the earlier view, is simply helping the court uncover the objectively correct outcome. See Spaulding, ____, at 1400, citing Geoffrey Hazard, Ethics in the Practice of Law 89 (1978).

Against this backdrop of growth, specialization, competition, and philosophical change, the ABA promulgated the 1983 Model Rules of Professional Responsibility. These included Model Rule 1.7, which addressed current conflicts of interest. The rule stated that a lawyer shall not represent a client “if the representation of that client will be directly adverse to another client” or “if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyer’s responsibilities to another client or to a third person, or by the lawyer’s own interests,” unless the lawyer reasonably believed that the representation would not be affected and the client consented after consultation.⁷² The rule itself did not mention positional conflicts, but the comments to Model Rule 1.7 included a short discussion that seemed to allow positional conflicts except under certain circumstances:

A lawyer may represent parties having antagonistic positions on a legal question that has arisen in different cases, unless representation of either client would be adversely affected. Thus, it is ordinarily not improper to assert such positions in cases pending in different trial courts, but it may be improper to do so in cases pending at the same time in an appellate court.⁷³

Comment 9 did not set down a rigid rule, but introduced the idea of positional conflict as an ethical issue. The comment was criticized for recognizing a positional conflict only before an appellate court when trial court decisions could also be influential with other judges.⁷⁴ The comment was criticized for using the term “adversely affected” rather than the “directly adverse” or “materially limited” language of the rule: “This ambiguity essentially allows lawyers to decide for themselves when a litigational positional conflict requires the independent determination of the effect on the client and the clients’ consent

⁷² MODEL CODE OF PROF’L CONDUCT R. 1.7 (1983). The rule was rewritten in 2002, but the “directly adverse” and “materially limited” language remains, as do the concepts of informed but objectively reasonable consent.

⁷³ MODEL CODE OF PROF’L CONDUCT R.1.7, cmt. para. 9 (1983).

⁷⁴ Wolfram, supra note 51, at 355, n. 41; Douglas R. Richmond, Choosing Sides: Issue or Positional Conflicts of Interest, 51 FLA. L. REV. 383, 390 (1999)

after disclosure.”⁷⁵ Another criticism was that the comment said nothing about notice and disclosure of positional conflicts to clients.⁷⁶ Thus, the criticisms urged a stronger rule against positional conflicts.

A 1993 ABA Ethics opinion departed from the Model Rule comment in analyzing positional conflicts of interest. The authors of the opinion rejected the comment’s distinction between appellate and trial courts, noting:

[E]ven if both cases were in the trial court, but assigned to different judges, the decision in the first-decided case would, in all likelihood, carry at least some precedential or persuasive weight in the second case. And if both cases should happen to end up before the same judge, the situation would be even worse. For although judges well understand that lawyers, at various stages of their careers, can find themselves arguing different sides of the same issue, the persuasiveness and credibility of the lawyer’s arguments in at least one of the two pending matters would quite possibly be lessened, consciously or subconsciously, in the mind of the judge.⁷⁷

The opinion thus advised that if there were a “substantial risk” that one representation would create a legal precedent, “even if not binding,” which is “likely materially to undercut the legal position urged on behalf of the other client,” the lawyer should not represent both clients without their consent after full disclosure.

Where the two matters would not be litigated in the same jurisdiction, the opinion suggested the following considerations in deciding whether representation of either client would be materially limited:⁷⁸

⁷⁵ Dzienkowski supra note 13, at 473.

⁷⁶ Id. at 473-4.

⁷⁷ ABA Comm. On Ethics and Prof’l Responsibility, Formal Op. 93-377, p.2 (1993).

⁷⁸ The Committee concluded that the “materially limited” language of then Model Rule 1.7 (b), rather than the “directly adverse” language of then Model Rule 1.7(a) applied, since in a positional conflict the

- (a) Is the issue one of such importance that its determination is likely to affect the ultimate outcome of at least one of the cases?
- (b) Is the determination of the issue in one case likely to have a significant impact on the determination of that issue in the other case? (For example, does the issue involve a new or evolving area of the law, where the first case decided may be regarded as persuasive authority by other courts, regardless of their geographical location? Or: is the issue one of federal law, where the decision by one federal judge will be given respectful consideration by another federal judge, even though they are not in the same district or state?)
- (c) Will there be any inclination by the lawyer, or her firm, to "soft-pedal" or de-emphasize certain arguments or issues--which otherwise would be vigorously pursued--so as to avoid impacting the other case?
- (d) Will there be any inclination within the firm to alter any arguments for one, or both clients, so that the firm's position in the two cases can be reconciled--and, if so, could that redound to the detriment of one of the clients?⁷⁹

The Committee's analysis was limited to positional conflicts between current clients. The Committee noted that lawyers were free to change positions from those advanced for former clients and that such changes raised no ethical issues.⁸⁰

In response to criticism, and in light of the 1993 Opinion, the comment to 1.7 was amended in 2002 as part of the large-scale amendments to the model rules. (The text of the rule was also amended).⁸¹ The new comment 24 on positional conflicts states:

attorney's clients are not involved in the same litigation and are not therefore ever directly adverse to on another. Id., n. 4.

⁷⁹ The pressure to reconcile arguments so that the positional conflict never materializes is an important concern. But including this factor in the analysis of a positional conflict does not seem all that helpful if the real problem is that this pressure results in the suppression of a positional conflict. If there is no positional conflict, there will be no need to look at the factors. Instead, lawyers should think about this factor whenever they consider related issues in otherwise unrelated cases. See section IV (A), infra.

⁸⁰ Id., at 1. Richmond, supra note 74, reached a similar conclusion, as does Dzienkowski (with reservations), supra note 13, at 480 and Hazard, supra note 54; See Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at n. 111.

Ordinarily a lawyer may take inconsistent legal positions in different tribunals at different times on behalf of different clients. The mere fact that advocating a legal position on behalf of one client might create precedent adverse to the interests of a client represented by the lawyer in an unrelated matter does not create a conflict of interest. A conflict of interest exists, however, if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's action on behalf of one client will materially limit the lawyer's effectiveness in representing another client in a different case; for example, when a decision favoring one client will create a precedent likely to seriously weaken the position taken on behalf of the other client. Factors relevant in determining whether the clients need to be advised of the risk include: where the cases are pending, whether the issue is substantive or procedural, the temporal relationship between the matters, the significance of the issue to the immediate and long-term interests of the clients involved and the clients' reasonable expectations in retaining the lawyer. If there is significant risk of material limitation, then absent informed consent of the affected clients, the lawyer must refuse one of the representations or withdraw from one or both matters.

Thus, the official statements of the ABA, in the form of its 1993 opinion and the comments to the Model Rules, are that a positional conflict is not per se an ethical violation, but that an attorney should look carefully at the attendant circumstances to determine whether a significant risk of material limitation of either representation exists. According to the ABA, a material limitation may result where the issue is sufficiently important to the clients and victory in one case will create adverse precedent for the other. While the 1993 opinion mentions credibility concerns, these are not the focus of the suggested analytical framework either in the opinion or the rule comments.

⁸¹ See note 72, supra.

III. Other Legal Authorities on Positional Conflicts

A. The Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers

The approach of the Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers to positional conflicts is very similar to the new comment 24 to Model Rule 1.7. It suggests the same factors for determining whether a positional conflict creates a conflict of interest and begins with the presumption that taking inconsistent positions in different courts is acceptable.⁸² The Restatement factors for evaluating a positional conflict seem to focus on the significance of the legal issue and the risk of creating adverse precedent for one of the clients. The illustrations provided emphasize the distinction between appellate and trial courts, as well as substance and procedure.⁸³

B. Caselaw addressing positional conflicts

⁸² The official comment to section 128 provides:

A lawyer ordinarily may take inconsistent legal positions in different courts at different times. While each client is entitled to the lawyer's effective advocacy of that client's position, if the rule were otherwise law firms would have to specialize in a single side of legal issues.

However, a conflict is presented when there is a substantial risk that a lawyer's action in Case A will materially and adversely affect another of the lawyer's clients in Case B. Factors relevant in determining the risk of such an effect include whether the issue is before a trial court or an appellate court; whether the issue is substantive or procedural; the temporal relationship between the matters; the practical significance of the issue to the immediate and long-run interests of the clients involved; and the clients' reasonable expectations in retaining the lawyer. If a conflict of interest exists, absent informed consent of the affected clients under § 122, the lawyer must withdraw from one or both of the matters.

Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 128, cmt. f.

⁸³ Id., illustrations 5,6:

5. Lawyer represents two clients in damage actions pending in different United States District Courts. In one case, representing the plaintiff, Lawyer will attempt to introduce certain evidence at trial and argue there for its admissibility. In the other case, representing a defendant, Lawyer will object to an anticipated attempt by the plaintiff to introduce similar evidence. Even if there is some possibility that one court's ruling might be published and cited as authority in the other proceeding, Lawyer may proceed with both representations without obtaining the consent of the clients involved.

6. The same facts as in Illustration 5, except that the cases have proceeded to the point where certiorari has been granted in each by the United States Supreme Court to consider the common evidentiary question. Any position that Lawyer would assert on behalf of either client on the legal issue common to each case would have a material and adverse impact on the interests of the other client. Thus, a conflict of interest is presented. Even the informed consent of both Client A and Client B would be insufficient to permit Lawyer to represent each before the Supreme Court.

There is next to no caselaw on purely legal positional conflicts, in striking contrast to the enormous number of decisions on conflicts of interest in general,⁸⁴ and what exists provides little guidance. The two cases that discuss purely legal positional conflicts are criminal cases involving public defenders; they reach very different conclusions. The cases usually cited by commentators on positional conflicts actually present factual positional conflicts—the attorneys are at cross purposes with the same set of facts, even if not in the same case.

One case frequently cited in writings on positional conflicts is the 1972 *Estates Theatres, Inc., v Columbia Pictures Indus.*⁸⁵ In this antitrust action, the lawyer for plaintiff Estates Theatres also represented United Artists Theatre Circuit as a plaintiff in another antitrust action. Although not a defendant in the first action, UATC had been named as a co-conspirator in a letter by the plaintiff, and plaintiff had alleged that a theater owned by UATC was receiving more favorable treatment than plaintiff's theatre. The defendants moved to disqualify plaintiff's counsel, arguing that "to support its claim he would necessarily be required to offer evidence that . . . one of the theatres owned by UATC, was the beneficiary of unlawful conduct at the expense of plaintiff, his other client." The defense also argued that plaintiff's efforts to unearth evidence of UATC's unlawful conduct would help the government in its own separate antitrust action against UATC. Thus the case seems to present a factual positional conflict because the plaintiff's attorney would be forced to develop and argue facts that would damage his other client.

But it is perhaps the court's "sweeping language"⁸⁶ that has led to its frequent citation:

⁸⁴ Rotunda, supra note 18 at § 6.2-2.

⁸⁵ 345 F.Supp. 93 (S.D.N.Y. 1972). Cited in Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 470; Wolfram, supra note 51; Richmond, supra note 74 at 398.

⁸⁶ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 471.

A lawyer should not be permitted to put himself in a position where, even unconsciously he will be tempted to ‘soft pedal’ his zeal in furthering the interests of one client in order to avoid an obvious clash with those of another, at least in the absence of the express consent of both clients. . . .The attorney cannot at one and the same time be the prosecutor of the plaintiff’s claim . . . and the defender of the target, UATC To allow such conflicting positions under the facts here presented would impair the confidence and respect of the community towards its bench and bar.⁸⁷

Arguably such language could be applied to legal positional conflicts as well as factual conflicts. The danger that a lawyer may modify arguments to accommodate both representations exists in both a factual and legal positional conflict.⁸⁸

Two other factual positional conflict cases, *Fiandaca v. Cunningham*⁸⁹ and Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Kerr-McGee Corp.,⁹⁰ are also sometimes cited as examples of positional conflicts.⁹¹ In Fiandaca, as discussed earlier, the New Hampshire Legal Assistance represented two class action clients and was faced with a conflict when the state offered to settle one class action by offering a facility then used by the other class. NHLA responded to the settlement offer by stating it was unwilling to agree to an offer that was “against the stated interests” of its other clients,⁹² clearly flagging its conflict of interest. The First Circuit Court of Appeals held that the NHLA should have been disqualified because its representation of one class was materially limited by its responsibilities to another, at least with respect to the settlement offer.⁹³ “In short, the combination of ⁸⁷ 345 F. Supp. at 99.

⁸⁸ This is the lesson that Professor Rotunda suggests taking from the factual positional conflict in Fiandaca. Rotunda, supra note 18, at § 8-6.14.5.

⁸⁹ 827 F.2d 825 (1st Cir. 1987).

⁹⁰ 580 F.2d 1311 (7th Cir. 1978)

⁹¹ Rotunda, supra note 18, at § 8-6.14.5; Richmond, supra note 74, at 400-403.

⁹² 827 F.2d at 827.

⁹³ The Fiandaca case has generated considerable discussion about scarcity of legal services and disqualification motions. See, e.g., Stephen Gillers, More About Us: Another Take on the Abusive Use of Legal Ethics Rules, 11 GEO. J. LEGAL ETHICS 843, 845 (1998); Kathy E. Hinck, Second Class Prisoners:

clients and circumstances placed NHLA in the untenable position of being simultaneously obligated to represent vigorously the interests of two conflicting clients.”⁹⁴ The factual conflict in Fiandaca seems quite clear. While there may be policy reasons to argue against disqualification—most notably the lack of alternative counsel for an indigent class—it is difficult to argue that NHLA’s representation was not compromised by its conflicting loyalties with respect to the facility that was the subject of the settlement offer. In addition, as with any factual conflict, there was probably a risk that confidential information from one client would be used against another client.

The possible misuse of confidential information was a large part of the court’s rationale in disqualifying counsel in the Westinghouse case. The law firm of Kirkland and Ellis represented plaintiff Westinghouse in an antitrust case alleging an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade in the uranium industry. At the same time, Kirkland and Ellis represented the American Petroleum Institute, of which three defendants in the Westinghouse suit were members, and lobbied Congress on API’s behalf. As part of that lobbying effort, Kirkland and Ellis took the position that the uranium industry was competitive and not in need of regulation. Thus its positions on the competitiveness of the uranium industry conflicted. However, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals ordered disqualification not so much because of these conflicting positions, but because Kirkland and Ellis had entered into a fiduciary relationship—if not a full-fledged attorney-client relationship—with the individual members of API (including those who were defendants in the Westinghouse litigation). The law firm had solicited confidential business information from those members and lead them to believe it would remain protected.⁹⁵ The Westinghouse case is thus more about a lawyer’s fiduciary duty than positional conflicts.

New Hampshire’s Placement Policy for Female Offenders, 15 NEW ENG. J. ON CRIM. & CIV. CONFINEMENT 225 (1989).

⁹⁴ 827 F.2d at 829.

⁹⁵ 580 F.2d at 1321.

The first case to address a straightforward purely legal positional conflict is Williams v. State.⁹⁶ In that case, the attorney appointed to represent a client on his appeal from conviction and death sentence for murder moved to withdraw. The attorney asserted that his client had an arguable appeal issue that the trial court erred when it gave “great weight” to the jury’s non-unanimous recommendation of the death penalty. However, the attorney had already filed a brief in the same court (the highest court of Delaware) arguing in another case that the trial court erred when it failed to give great weight to the jury’s non-unanimous recommendation against the death penalty. The attorney argued that he had a conflict of interest because of the risk that he would create unfavorable precedent for one client, his credibility with the court would be undermined, and his clients would reasonably question his loyalty to them.⁹⁷ The State agreed that the attorney had a conflict of interest.

The court allowed the withdrawal, holding that “It would be a violation of the Delaware Rules of Professional Conduct for [the attorney] to advocate conflicting legal positions in two capital murder appeals that are pending simultaneously in this Court.”⁹⁸ Delaware had adopted the Model Rules, including Rule 1.7 and the earlier comment that emphasized the inappropriateness of a positional conflict in an appellate court.⁹⁹ The court also alluded to the criminal clients’ constitutional rights to effective assistance of counsel on appeal.¹⁰⁰ Because there was no opposition to the motion to withdraw, either from the state or the client, the decision does not really test the arguments for or against a positional conflict under these circumstances.

⁹⁶ 805 A.2d 880 (Del. 2002).

⁹⁷ The arguments in the two cases could be reconciled, of course, by arguing in both cases that only a jury recommendation of leniency should be given great weight. By the time the attorney received the second case, it may have been too late to tailor the arguments in the first case. Moreover, to change the arguments in this way would have been to allow one representation to limit the other. See section IV, infra.

⁹⁸ 805 A.2d at 882.

⁹⁹ 805 A.2d at 881.

¹⁰⁰ “Given his clients’ disparate legal arguments, [the attorney’s] independent obligations to his clients may compromise the effectiveness of his assistance as appellate counsel for one or both clients unless his motion to withdraw is granted.” 805 A.2d at 882. Interestingly, the attorney who was later appointed to represent Williams did not even raise the jury recommendation issue, but obtained a reversal of the death penalty on another ground. See Williams v. State, 818 A.2d 906 (Del. 2002) (reversing death sentence). Telephone interview with Bernard J. O’Donnell, attorney for appellant in State v. Williams, 805 A.2d 880 (Del. 2002).

Another criminal case discussed positional conflicts in an adversarial setting, and with different results. In Federal Defenders of San Diego Inc., v. United States Sentencing Commission,¹⁰¹ organizations of federal public defenders brought suit challenging the constitutionality of sentencing guidelines issued by the United States Sentencing Commission. The case was dismissed for lack of standing. As part of their argument for standing, the plaintiffs had claimed injury in fact based on positional conflicts that would be created by the sentencing guidelines. The lawyers argued that because some of their clients would be better off under the guidelines while the majority would be worse off, if they successfully challenged the guidelines on behalf of the majority they would actually injure some of their clients. They noted that the ethical dilemma is “exacerbated” because they would rarely know until well into a case whether a particular client fell into the disadvantaged group. The court rejected the argument, doubting the significance of the number of conflicting cases.

The court also expressed doubt about whether a positional conflict was an ethical problem. “In addition, with all due respect to [plaintiff’s expert], I am not at all convinced that the taking of inconsistent positions in separate cases raises the sort of ethical dilemma that [the expert] suggests.” But the court recognized the discomfort individual attorneys may feel and recommended that they be allowed to recuse themselves “when they consider it appropriate.”¹⁰²

The paucity of caselaw discussing legal positional conflicts does not mean such positional conflicts do not arise. There is evidence both for and against the prevalence of positional conflicts in practice.¹⁰³ The lack of caselaw may be explained by, among other reasons, (1) scarcity of positional conflicts, (2) the ability of lawyers to make conflicts go away through careful tailoring or distinguishing of arguments, (3) such conflicts are suppressed when an attorney bows to pressure from a powerful client, (4) such conflicts go undetected because they are in different courts or jurisdictions, or (5) an opponent detecting such a conflict would rather impeach the lawyer with the conflict than move to disqualify. For whatever reason, positional conflicts do not seem to be giving rise to significant litigation, and therefore cases do not provide significant guidance in this area. The most recent cases involve public defenders, who cannot be fired, who cannot quietly drop one client to eliminate a problem, and who have no financial conflict between clients that might cause them to suppress a positional conflict.

¹⁰¹ 680 F.Supp. 26 (D.C.D.C. 1988). Seventeen years later, the guidelines were ruled unconstitutional. United States v. Booker, 2005 WL 50108 (Jan 12, 2005).

¹⁰² 680 F.Supp. at 30.

¹⁰³ See supra.

C. State ethics opinions

State and local bar opinions that have addressed positional conflicts have drawn heavily from the ABA ethics opinion, the Model Rules and the Restatement. Like these authorities, most bar associations have concluded that a positional conflict before the same judge may create a conflict under Rule 1.7, but one to which clients may usually consent after full disclosure. On the other hand, wary of the practical implications of an ethical prohibition on positional conflicts, and aware of the difficulty of separating innocuous conflicts from the more serious, two states have concluded that a legal positional conflict is not a conflict of interest. Even those states that do not find a positional conflict to be a conflict of interest recommend that attorneys disclose the problem to their clients.

No conflict. The Bars of California and Maine have determined that a legal positional conflict is not a conflict of interest, even when the attorney argues opposite sides of an issue before the same court. The 1989 opinion of the California State Bar Standing Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct was based on a scenario in which the attorney had to argue contrary legal positions in two cases pending in federal court, assigned to the same judge. The committee characterized these facts as the “ ‘worst case’ scenario presented by the so-called ‘issues conflict’ conundrum.”¹⁰⁴ The committee noted the possibility of creating adverse precedent for a client, and the damage to the attorney's credibility before the court, but nevertheless refused to find an ethical violation.

¹⁰⁴ California Ethics Opinion No. 1989-208 at 2.

The committee noted that positional conflicts are “common and prolific in our adversarial system of justice. Almost daily the litigator or transactional attorney finds himself or herself taking positions on behalf of clients which are antithetical to another client.”¹⁰⁵ The committee concluded that to impose a burden of disclosure and consent on all positional conflicts would be extreme and diminish the availability of attorneys. And it determined that it would be impossible to craft a rule that could distinguish between serious and trivial positional conflicts: “If it were possible to proscribe the nondisclosure and non-consensual representation defined by our hypothetical without improperly infringing on the types of inherent ‘issues conflicts’ which occur commonly and which cannot even be fairly detected by even the most dedicated practitioner, we would not hesitate to do so. We must conclude that these most rare and extreme scenarios where potential harm is high nevertheless must yield, as they have in other instances, to higher priorities.”¹⁰⁶

The committee did recommend, however, that the prudent attorney disclose a positional conflict where there was reason to believe clients might otherwise be harmed, and noted that there might be civil liability for such harm in certain circumstances.¹⁰⁷ (The committee did not explain what that harm might be, and it is difficult to imagine, absent some additional act or omission by the attorney). Thus the committee seemed to recognize a potential for harm, but deemed a rule against positional conflicts unworkable.

¹⁰⁵ Id. at 3.

¹⁰⁶ Id. at 3. The committee also rejected arguments that the positional conflict violated the ethical requirements of competence and loyalty. Id. at 4-5.

¹⁰⁷ The committee did not elaborate on the potential for civil liability, but merely stated, “Beyond client considerations, the attorney must keep in mind the potential for civil liability if harm to the clients does occur which might have been avoided by timely disclosure.” Id. at 4.

Similarly the Maine Professional Ethics Commission rejected the approach of the ABA 1993 ethics opinion and concluded that “an ‘issue conflict,’ without more, is not a conflict of interest.” The commission was in part influenced by its view that screening for positional conflicts would be extremely burdensome, and that there was little real need: “We decline to interpret [the conflict rules] to require the bar to adopt screening procedures for issue conflicts which experience tells us are, in any event, extremely rare.”¹⁰⁸ But while the commission did not find a conflict of interest, it noted that arguing opposite sides of the same issue before the same judge or judges could violate other rules requiring the lawyer to employ “reasonable care and skill” and to “employ the lawyer’s best judgment.”¹⁰⁹ The Maine Commission found that it would not be possible to state a rule for when the rule would be implicated, but that it would depend on the particular facts.¹¹⁰

May be Conflict of Interest. A number of state ethics opinions find that while not all positional conflicts present an ethical problem, arguing opposite sides of the same legal issue before the same appellate court is a conflict of interest. Most, but not all, find that it may be cured by client consent.

Arizona and Philadelphia bar opinions find that arguing contrary legal positions before the same appellate court creates a conflict of interest that must be disclosed and consented to by both clients. Like the California Committee, the Philadelphia committee assumed that positional conflicts were common:

Practices throughout the country all have lawyers who go into court on one day and argue an interpretation of the law for custody for a mother and the next day go into a different court in a different case and argue a different interpretation for a father. This is the essence of what a lawyer does.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁸ Maine Ethics Opinion. No. 155 (1997) at 4.

¹⁰⁹ Id. at 4, citing Maine Bar Rule 3.6.

¹¹⁰ Id.

¹¹¹ Philadelphia Ethics Opinion No. 89-27 at 2.

Unlike the California committee, the Philadelphia committee saw no difficulty in recognizing a conflict of interest, but limited the ethical problem to contrary legal arguments in the same appellate court. The Philadelphia opinion finds that the conflict is imputed to all of the lawyer's partners and suggests that there may be instances when even consent would be inadequate to cure the conflict, but does not elaborate on what those circumstances might be.¹¹² The Arizona opinion, on the other hand, states that a legal positional conflict can always be cured by consent:

We do not believe that the presentation of purely legal arguments before an appellate court is the sort of situation that automatically vitiates the informed consent of the clients involved to Law Firm A's continued involvement. Appellate judges are presumably trained to recognize that advocates are often required to take positions contrary to those previously taken by their partners, when the interests of a client so require. We cannot conclude that the judges of the Ninth Circuit will be prejudiced against one side or the other in either of the two cases at issue simply because of Law Firm A's involvement. The questioning at oral argument may be somewhat uncomfortable for the lawyers involved, but we cannot conclude that the situation will necessarily prejudice either of the clients.¹¹³

A District of Columbia Bar opinion illustrates some of the problems with the prevailing approach to positional conflicts. The opinion responded to an inquiry by a private attorney who regularly represented children and foster parents involved in the child welfare system and had been asked to serve as outside general counsel to an association of foster parents. The bar opinion began with the assumption that same day contrary legal arguments in the same appellate court would be a conflict of interest. For less stark situations, the court referred to the factors set forth in the ABA ethics opinion, and suggested that with far-flung offices in large firms, the conflict might not always be imputed.¹¹⁴ The opinion implied that client consent could cure any positional conflict. The opinion did address what would seem to be the greater danger: that a positional conflict would not materialize because the attorney's greater allegiance would be to the larger, repeat client.

¹¹² Id.

¹¹³ Arizona Ethics Opinion No. 87-15 (1987).

The D.C. opinion concluded that because most of the attorney's work was in one or two city courts, "It would be ethically impermissible for her to take simultaneously inconsistent positions on issues of law on behalf of different clients in those two courts without the informed consent of all of her affected clients where the representation of one client creates a substantial likelihood that her success on behalf of one client might substantially impact another client adversely." The opinion thus seems to strengthen incentives not to raise conflicting arguments.

The opinion recommended that the attorney alert her individual clients that she represented the foster parent organization, inasmuch as she may become identified in the eyes of the court as the representative of that organization's interests. It also discussed the possibility of a prospective waiver by the organization, although it did not advise such advance waivers by individual clients, who were "unsophisticated consumer[s] of legal services."¹¹⁵

Faced with a similar power imbalance between clients, the New York City Bar Association addressed pro bono representation of complainants before the City Human Rights Commission by attorneys who also represented respondents before the Commission on unrelated cases.¹¹⁶ The opinion advised the attorneys to make an independent determination of any perceived conflict but otherwise approved of such pro bono representation. As in the District of Columbia situation, the greater danger here seems to be not positional conflicts but that the pro bono attorneys would not raise issues likely to annoy paying clients. Like the District of Columbia opinion, the New York opinion does not address this danger.

¹¹⁴ D.C. Ethics Opinion No. 265 (1996).

¹¹⁵ Id.

¹¹⁶ Association of the Bar of the City of New York formal Ethics Opinion No. 1990-4 (1990) The Association adopted an earlier draft of the Restatement comment on positional conflicts, which distinguished between "representation with 'indirect precedential effect on another client's legal position' (which presents no conflict) and 'arguing both sides of an unsettled point of law before the same tribunal on behalf of different clients' (which presents a conflict because 'the argument in each case would

A Michigan ethics opinion takes the most rigid stance against positional conflicts, finding that arguing opposite sides of the same issue before the state supreme court would create an unconsentable conflict requiring the lawyer to withdraw from both cases.¹¹⁷ That rigid stance is no doubt explained by the attorney's extreme situation. In the facts before the Committee the lawyer found himself arguing conflicting legal positions not only before the same court, but also where his two conflicting cases had been consolidated.

Similarly, a New Mexico ethics opinion seems to take the position that a positional conflict in the same trial or appellate court would violate the rule against conflicts of interest, regardless of consent.¹¹⁸ Attorney credibility seems to be the implicit concern with these "same court" positional conflicts.

D. State Professional Conduct rules

The majority of states that have adopted the Model Rules have also adopted the original 1983 comments that maintained the distinction between positional conflicts in trial and appellate courts. A number have amended their rules to adopt the 2002 ABA comments.¹¹⁹ inevitably affect the other. ')" (quoting ALI Proposed Restatement, THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS, § 209, cmt. (f) (tent. Draft No. 3, April 10, 1990)).

¹¹⁷ Michigan Ethics Opinion No. RI-108 at 2 (1991). "Under these circumstances a disinterested lawyer could not reasonably conclude that the representation of the client would not be adversely affected." Id.

¹¹⁸ The New Mexico decision states that the lawyer "should not attempt the dual representation." New Mexico Advisory Opinion No. 1990-3. Where the positional conflict is in some other context, the lawyer should seek the consent of the clients to proceed. Id.

¹¹⁹ As of 2005, nine states have adopted the 2002 ABA comments: Arkansas, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Minnesota, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, and Utah. Massachusetts has provided its own comment, stressing that occasionally a positional conflict may be non-consentable:

One state has addressed positional conflicts in the text of the rule itself. Oregon’s Code of Professional Responsibility states that a positional conflict constitutes a conflict of interest only if a lawyer knows his or her firm represents conflicting positions and knows that one representation will adversely affect the other:

A conflict of interest is not present solely because one or more lawyers in a firm assert conflicting legal positions on behalf of different clients whom the lawyers represent in factually unrelated cases. If, however, a lawyer actually knows of the assertion of the conflicting positions and also actually knows that an outcome favorable to one client in one case will adversely affect the client in the other case, the lawyer may not continue with both representations or permit other lawyers at the same firm to do so unless all clients consent after full disclosure.¹²⁰

Under the Oregon rule, the certainty of adverse precedential effect—the rule does not limit such effect to appellate courts—makes a positional conflict a conflict of interest, but only where the lawyers knows of the certainty. It is easy to see why the Oregon Bar wanted to limit positional conflicts to situations where there would be an adverse effect and to those that lawyers actually knew of, so that firms are not responsible for unwitting positional conflicts. But might such a rule encourage lawyers to avert their eyes and try not to learn of the positions taken by their partners? The rule requires “actual” knowledge; constructive knowledge is not enough.¹²¹

“A lawyer may ordinarily represent parties having antagonistic positions on a legal question that has arisen in different matters. However, the antagonism may relate to an issue that is so crucial to the resolution of a matter as to require that the clients be advised of the conflict and their consent obtained. On rare occasions, such as the argument of both sides of a legal question before the same court at the same time, the conflict may be so severe that a lawyer could not continue the representation even with client consent.”

MASS. RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT R. 1.7, cmt. 9.

¹²⁰ OR. CODE OF PROF’L RESPONSIBILITY DR 5-105(A)(3).

¹²¹ Another approach might be to require actual knowledge, but also consider the reasonableness of the lawyer’s knowledge in light of whether the lawyer maintained an effective system for checking conflicts. See DC CODE OF PROF’L RESPONSIBILITY R. 1.7, cmt.

The District of Columbia rejected a much broader rule on positional conflicts in 1986. “Proposed Rule 1.7(b)(5) would have required a lawyer to make full disclosure and to seek client consent where other interests of a client will be or are likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer’s assumption of such representation, and the proposed commentary said that the protected client interests would be as broad as business rivalry or personal differences between two potential clients.”¹²²

The proposed rule met with strong opposition on the grounds that it threatened lawyer independence as well as lawyers’ willingness and ability to represent unpopular and pro bono clients. The rule ultimately adopted went in the opposite direction of the proposed rule, and affirmed lawyer independence.¹²³

Neither the proposed nor adopted rule expressly mentioned positional conflicts, although both could be read to cover them. The real target of the final rule is business conflicts and preserving lawyers’ independence from powerful clients. The D.C. Bar was correct to give prominence to this concern; the ethics rules cannot force lawyers to act independently of their powerful clients, but they should not forbid them from doing so.

¹²² D.C. Ethics Opinion No. 265 (1996)

¹²³ Id. The current DC rule instead contains language limiting client control over the positions attorneys take in unrelated matters: “A client may, on occasion, adopt unreasonable positions with respect to having the lawyer who is representing that client also represent other parties. Such an unreasonable position may be based on an aversion to the other parties being represented by a lawyer, or on some philosophical or ideological ground having no foundation in the rules regarding representation of conflicting interests. Whatever difficulties may be presented for the lawyer in such circumstances as a matter of client relations, the unreasonable positions taken by a client do not fall within the circumstances requiring notification and consent. Clients have broad discretion to terminate their representation by a lawyer and that discretion may generally be exercised on unreasonable as well as reasonable grounds.

...

A lawyer retained for a limited purpose may not be aware of the full range of a client's other interests or positions on issues. Except in matters involving a specific party or parties, a lawyer is not required to inquire of a client concerning the full range of that client's interests in issues, unless it is clear to the lawyer that there is a potential for adversity between the interests of clients of the lawyer. Where lawyers are associated in a firm within the meaning of Rule 1.10(a), the rule stated in the preceding sentence must be applied to all lawyers and all clients in the firm. Unless a lawyer is aware that representing one client involves seeking a result to which another client is opposed, Rule 1.7 is not violated by a representation that eventuates in the lawyer's unwittingly taking a position for one client adverse to the interests of another client. The test to be applied here is one of reasonableness and may turn on whether the lawyer has an effective conflict checking system in place.”

DC CODE OF PROF'L RESPONSIBILITY, R. 1.7, cmt.

IV. The Real Dangers: Business Conflicts and Credibility Concerns

The preceding review of authorities on positional conflicts shows that a positional conflict is not presently seen as a per se conflict of interest and therefore not a per se ethical violation. These authorities cite several key factors in analyzing whether a positional conflict rises to the level of an ethical violation: (1) the issue's importance to the cases and clients, (2) the potential that one representation will lead to adverse precedent for the other; and, (to a lesser extent), (3) incentives to favor one client over the other, and (4) credibility problems.

This prevailing approach to positional conflicts is wrong because it diverts attention away from the real ethical dangers. In fact, business pressures are the more prevalent force in practice, and even a soft rule against positional conflicts serves to aggravate these economic conflicts. The focus on positional conflicts as potential conflicts of interest only reinforces the power of wealthy clients and restricts client access to counsel of choice, especially for poor or low income clients. The concern with creating adverse precedent has more to do with strategic credibility than with true conflict of interest. Thus, a rule against positional conflicts is ill-advised.

At the same time, positional conflicts raise credibility problems that cannot be ignored by the prudent lawyer. There is a tension between the conclusion that there should be no rule against positional conflicts, and the acknowledgment of these credibility problems. This tension cannot be entirely eliminated, but is best resolved by allowing positional conflicts, but also allowing lawyers to withdraw from positional conflicts, as will be shown by the example of the public defender.

A. Business Conflicts—not Positional Conflicts—are the Problem

Since the ABA first addressed positional conflicts in the 1983 comments to Model Rule 1.7, positional conflicts have been analyzed primarily as a particular kind of conflict of interest. This focus has led to some confusion about the nature of the problem, however, as a legal positional conflict by itself is a faulty indicator of a conflict of interest. In fact, when a lawyer actually takes conflicting positions on behalf of separate clients, it shows that any conflict may have been overcome. Absent any significant self-interested reason for a lawyer to favor one client over the other, a positional conflict does not present a true conflict of interest.¹²⁴

The more serious problem occurs when a lawyer has a business reason to favor one client over the other and therefore is motivated to suppress a positional conflict by either not raising the argument for the less favored client or tailoring it so that it does not conflict with the argument for the more favored client.¹²⁵ There are many ways in which this may happen. The lawyer may leave out a meritorious argument, make a much narrower argument than he otherwise would, or argue for a much broader interpretation of a rule than would an attorney who did not have the business conflict. A lawyer who argues for a broad interpretation of a rule so that it will include both clients may be foregoing a narrow argument for one client, a narrow argument that a court would be more likely to accept. On the other hand, a lawyer who makes only a narrow argument may be foregoing a broad policy argument that might appeal to some decision-makers.¹²⁶ And of course, lawyers may also avoid a positional conflict by simply dropping or refusing the representation of the less favored client.

A clever lawyer can often figure out how to avoid a positional conflict by narrowing the arguments in each representation or by distinguishing the cases factually. Such strategies may be in the best interests of the clients—in many cases it may be strategically wise to ask for the narrowest ruling. A lawyer may sincerely believe the distinctions are sound and that there is no conflict between the positions. But where the strategy is influenced by the lawyer's duties to another client a conflict may be present. Such a conflict will be difficult to detect. Where the arguments are not in direct conflict, it will be hard to show a positional conflict of interest.¹²⁷ Thus, the more serious threat to disinterested representation is business conflicts in general, not positional conflicts per se.

¹²⁴ The lawyer may be faced with competing objectives by clients and other conflicts for his time, etc., but the representation itself is not infected with the temptation to use confidential info. See Samuel Issacharoff, Legal Responses to Conflicts of Interest, Chp.13 in CONFLICTS OF INTEREST: CHALLENGES AND SOLUTIONS IN BUSINESS, LAW, MEDICINE, AND PUBLIC POLICY 191 (Moore, Cain, Loewenstein, Bazerman, eds., 2005) (noting that law is most concerned with conflicts infected by self-interest.)

¹²⁵ See Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 509-510.

¹²⁶ See Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 484-5 for more examples.

A business conflict between clients is not usually a disqualifying conflict of interest, nor should it be. A business conflict is defined as “the risk of loss of business from having a firm member be perceived to adopt a [] position that one of the firm’s clients might not like.”¹²⁸ In our capitalist system, lawyers are expected to face and overcome economic pressures to the extent they must provide disinterested and competent representation to all clients. The rules do not require lawyers to avoid business conflicts,¹²⁹ but lawyers are expected not to let such economic pressure actually materially impair representation.

Nevertheless, research has shown the strength of these business conflicts in suppressing positional conflicts. Attorneys in larger firms face significant pressure from clients not to undertake cases that go against their interests, even if unrelated to their representation by the firm.¹³⁰ As one large firm lawyer put it, “We know what side our bread is buttered on, and we stay there.”¹³¹ This pressure is particularly strong when it comes to considering pro bono representation that might conflict with the interests of paying clients, and the pressure may come from other lawyers in the firm who simply fear alienating important clients.¹³²

¹²⁷ See, e.g., Advanced Display Systems, Inc. v. Kent State University, 2001 WL 1524433 at 6 (N.D. Tex. 11/29/2001) (unpublished) (denying disqualification motion where attorney could reconcile potentially conflicting arguments about corporate alter ego doctrine).

¹²⁸ See Gordon, supra note 19.

¹²⁹ The rules do restrict the economic stake an attorney can have in a case, and limit business transactions with clients. MODEL CODE OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 1.7. But the rules do not forbid the kind of economic pressure a lawyer will feel from wanting to keep or attract business.

¹³⁰ Shapiro, supra note 20, at 1167. Using the term “positional conflict” to mean simply clients with differing interests, the author writes: “Positional conflicts are world class business conflicts, especially when the positions in contention are deeply held by large, powerful, repeat-playing institutions—the staple of large law firms. Again, the difficulties engendered by positional conflicts are rarely legal ones; they are about business, client relations, and intra-firm politics, about how to serve the needs of important clients without undermining or alienating others.” Id.

¹³¹ Spaulding, infra note 159, at 1409.

¹³² Id., generally. In another survey, “One question asked attorneys how their organizations dealt with matters that might prove objectionable to clients, other lawyers, or the community. Another question asked how satisfied attorneys were with the types of cases that were permitted. A relatively small number of lawyers answered these questions. Of those who did, about two-fifths were in organizations that discouraged work likely to advance positions inconsistent with client interests or values.” Deborah Rhodes, Pro Bono in Principle and Practice, 53 J.

Lawyers will tend to conform their conduct to their own business interests, which are the same as those of their valuable clients. This conformity in many instances will be almost unthinking and automatic. Psychological research shows that when a person's self-interest is involved in a decision, the self-interest operates automatically and outside of conscious awareness to cause the person to prefer a certain course of action. Conscious reason then rationalizes this choice.¹³³ Such research supports the hypothesis that lawyers faced with potential positional conflicts will find a way to avoid them without much agonizing by reframing arguments or refusing representation.¹³⁴ The positional conflict will never materialize, and the lawyer's business interest in one or both clients is maintained.

If business conflicts, and the lawyer's own self-interest in maintaining valuable clients are more prevalent than true legal positional conflicts, a rule against positional conflicts becomes at best another rationalization that supports the operation of the business conflict. (We see this rationalization even in the confusion of the terms: many lawyers seem to use the term "positional conflict" to mean simply a business conflict).¹³⁵ At worst, the mere possibility of a positional conflict becomes a reason to tailor, curtail or refuse representation, all in the service of the lawyer's economic interests. An over-emphasis on avoiding positional conflicts thus creates another incentive to behave in ways that favor powerful clients at the expense of less powerful clients.

Of course, it is possible that where a lawyer has a positional conflict, together with a business reason to favor one client over the other, a true conflict of interest may arise. Where the attorney retains both cases despite a significant business conflict the danger is that the attorney will soft-pedal the arguments in the less-favored case, or engineer the timing of arguments so that favored case is decided first, lessening the chance of adverse

OF LEGAL EDUC. 413, 452-3 (2003). See also Gordon, supra note 19, arguing that market forces cause law firms to prohibit their lawyers from pro bono or other activities that could be perceived as adopting a policy position that a client might not like.

¹³³ Don A. Moore and George Loewenstein, Self-Interest, Automaticity, and the Psychology of Conflict of Interest, 17 SOC. JUSTICE RES., 189, 190-991 (2004).

¹³⁴ See discussion of Matthew Hale Carpenter, supra part I.

¹³⁵ See N.Y. TIMES, supra note 21; Ringel, supra note 23.

precedent from the disfavored case, but potentially creating adverse precedent for the disfavored case.¹³⁶ But attorneys face conflicting business incentives all the time—in determining which cases to prioritize, how much time to put into a case, etc. Ironically, where a business conflict and a positional conflict co-exist, it may actually mean that the business conflict has been overcome to the extent that the positional conflict has not been suppressed. Senator Matthew Hale Carpenter’s 1872 positional conflict is an example of an attorney arguing a pro bono case in a way that undermined the arguments he made for his paying client.¹³⁷

Thus, while business conflicts are pervasive and powerful, an overly fastidious attention to business conflicts may lead to even greater specialization and client identification, decreasing lawyer independence and the general availability of legal services to unpopular or poorly paying clients.

B. Risk of Adverse Precedent is Not Conflict of Interest

If the lawyer has no business reason to favor one client over the other, a positional conflict is not a conflict of interest but rather an indication that there is no conflict preventing the attorney from making the contrary arguments. Yet, the ABA comments and much of the other authority on positional conflicts state that a positional conflict will rise to the level of a prohibited conflict of interest if there is a significant risk that a “decision favoring one client will create a precedent likely to seriously weaken the position taken on behalf of the other client.”¹³⁸ These authorities reason that where a lawyer’s argument is meant to create precedent favorable to one client but adverse to another, the “representation of [the second] client will be materially limited by the lawyer’s responsibilities to another client,” in violation of Model Rule 1.7.

It is not clear how the risk of creating adverse precedent materially limits representation of another client. One might argue that the creation of adverse precedent does not really demonstrate a conflict of interest because the precedent would have been created regardless of who made the arguments. “It is for the court to sort out and apply the correct legal principles. That being so, the involvement of a single lawyer on both sides of an issue is no different from two lawyers who argue two different sides before the same tribunal.”¹³⁹ Of course, such a conclusion requires us to assume that all lawyers are equally competent.¹⁴⁰ A disparity in legal resources and lawyering skills might mean that the potential of creating adverse precedent should be a greater concern for the better or well-funded lawyer. If a particularly good lawyer works on both sides of a legal issue equally well, that lawyer runs a risk of creating adverse precedent that would not have been suggested by a less competent lawyer. That might be a practical reason for a client to oppose a positional conflict, but is it an ethical problem?

¹³⁶ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 488.

¹³⁷ Bradwell, supra note 6.

¹³⁸ MODEL CODE OF PROF’L CONDUCT R. 1.7, cmt. 24.

The rules of professional responsibility are usually blind to economic or skill disparities.¹⁴¹ We have yet to condition the operation of the ethical rules on the resources of individual clients and lawyers, usually assuming that all lawyers are equally competent and that alternative counsel is always available, although it is clear these assumptions are not empirically valid.¹⁴² In any event, the varying skill levels of attorneys is unrelated to the harm a positional conflict rule is directed at: the rule is not to ensure skilled representation, but to prevent a lawyer from working against the client’s interest.

More importantly, while lawyers certainly have a hand in shaping the law, ultimately it is not the lawyer who “causes” the precedent, but the court that issues it. The authorities agree that adverse precedent resulting from an earlier representation does not create a conflict of interest, nor does adverse precedent that might result from a concurrent ¹³⁹ Walther, supra note 46, at 139.

¹⁴⁰ Dzienkowski refutes this argument with the observation that the lawyer can to some extent control the timing of the decision by making or forgoing motions, and that “the strength of the facts and the lawyer’s persuasiveness in the first case to be decided may significantly influence the second representation.” Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 488. But Dzienkowski’s refutation seems to rely on the workings of a business or other conflict to influence a lawyer to favor one case over the other. If there is really no business conflict between the two cases, then theoretically it should make no difference to the outcome of the cases whether one or two lawyers or firms make the contradictory arguments—if we assume that all lawyers are equally skilled.

¹⁴¹ Fred Z. Zacharias, Confronting Lies, Fictions, and False Paradigms in Legal Ethics Regulation, 44 ARIZ. L.REV. 829, 838 (2002), noting “fictions of symmetry” in the Model Rules, including the fiction that all lawyers are equally competent.

¹⁴² See, e.g., Walther, supra note 46, at 139: “Assuming equal competence, neither client is more harmed by a single lawyer arguing a conflicting position than by two lawyers doing so.”

representation in another (unpersuasive) jurisdiction.¹⁴³ It is difficult to see how the risk of creating adverse precedent in one case really “materially limits” the representation, although the precedent may certainly negatively affect the second client—especially if the creation of adverse precedent before the representation does not materially limit it.¹⁴⁴

The real problem with a representation that may lead to adverse precedent for another client—regardless of whether it is in the trial or appellate court—is one of credibility. The client, and perhaps the public, will understandably be upset to learn that her lawyer has been working successfully against her interests. A client is entitled to know that the risk of such precedent exists—more as a matter of courtesy than anything else.¹⁴⁵ The mere fact that a lawyer’s legal argument in one case might lead to precedent adverse to another client does not create a conflict of interest where one otherwise would not exist.

C. Credibility concerns

Even if a pure legal positional conflict is not by itself a conflict of interest, and even if the greater problem is business conflicts, a positional conflict creates problems of credibility. While these concerns do not rise to the level of an ethical violation, a lawyer arguing out of both sides of her mouth may have credibility issues with her client, the court and the public at large. How we evaluate these credibility problems turns on our ideal of law practice and whether we value more greatly lawyer independence from or loyalty to clients. An ethics code that clearly allowed positional conflicts would do much to reduce ¹⁴³ See section III, supra.

¹⁴⁴ A less frequently mentioned risk in positional conflicts is the danger that the lawyer will be doing the opponent’s legal work. Dzienkowski discusses the danger of sending opposing arguments out into “the public domain.” Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 490. He notes this is more of a problem when there is a great difference in legal resources—i.e. when the positionally conflicted lawyer is particularly well-funded or good. An opponent who discovers these public arguments from another case will realize an advantage he or she would not otherwise have had. The growth of the internet since Dzienkowski originally made this point in 1993 has significantly increased the likelihood that one’s opponent will have easy access to all one’s publicly submitted documents.

Most discussions of positional conflicts assume that the law and arguments about the law are equally accessible to all lawyers. In real life, of course, there can be great disparities in legal resources and the quality of lawyering. If these disparities exist, an opponent’s discovery of an attorney’s contrary arguments in another case may not only allow the opponent to question the attorney’s credibility, but also provide the opponent with arguments and briefing the opponent would not otherwise have developed.

¹⁴⁵ California Ethics Opinion No. 1989-208 at 4

these credibility problems, but some credibility concerns would remain even for the fiercest advocate of lawyer independence.

Both loyalty and independence can be portrayed as virtues or vices: loyalty to the downtrodden but deserving client is a virtue, but loyalty to the soulless corporation in its quest to avoid just compensation is “selling out.” A lawyer like Atticus Finch who has the independence to represent with honor disparate interests in the same community is virtuous¹⁴⁶; a lawyer who will represent any side of a question as long as he is paid is merely an unprincipled hired gun.

Commentators who come down more on the side of enforcing client loyalty tend to urge recognition of positional conflicts. Dzienkowski, who wrote a seminal article on positional conflicts, recommended that the Model Rules be amended to suggest analyzing positional conflicts in light of several factors similar to those eventually adopted in the 1993 ABA ethics opinion and Restatement.¹⁴⁷ Professor Dzienkowski believed that material positional conflicts violate client expectations of loyalty and damage the legal profession in the eyes of the public. Others have echoed these concerns.¹⁴⁸

Others, particularly those concerned about the availability of lawyers for pro bono work, emphasize the need for attorney independence from powerful clients. To these commentators, an ethical prohibition of positional conflicts would exacerbate the difficulty legal services organizations already face in trying to recruit lawyers to take on cases that may go against the business or political interests of their important clients.¹⁴⁹ In their view, clients already exert too much power over their attorneys.

¹⁴⁶ While Atticus seemed willing to represent various interests—the wrongly accused black man as well as some of the poor whites who wanted to hang him—one suspects that he would not have pursued a dishonorable goal for his clients. See HARPER LEE, TO KILL A MOCKINGBIRD (1960).

¹⁴⁷ Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 529.

¹⁴⁸ J. Vincent Aprile, II, Positional Conflicts and Criminal Justice Litigators, CRIMINAL JUSTICE (Winter 2000) 56, 58. Aprile was really more concerned with the detrimental effect such a conflict would have on the representation itself by undercutting credibility. But he also believed that public defenders should not have positional conflicts imputed to their entire firm.

¹⁴⁹ Spaulding infra note 159. Dzienkowski also recognized the pro bono problem, supporting a positional conflict exception for law reform activities, but stopped short of an exception for litigation. Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 461.

Obviously, not all clients have this kind of power. Lawyers whose client base is primarily individuals (“Personal plight cases”¹⁵⁰) may be quite independent from the clients.

Clients—such as indigent criminal defendants, legal services clients, or insureds—whose legal bills are paid by others may also have very little leverage over their attorneys.

Related to the tension between loyalty and independence is a more fundamental question about the nature of the lawyer’s work: should lawyers mean what they say, or is it honorable to make arguments simply because they serve the client’s cause?¹⁵¹ This question also is important to the concerns raised about the lawyer’s credibility in the context of positional conflicts: if lawyers are hired guns, why does it undermine their credibility to take conflicting legal positions? On the other hand, does an attorney enjoy more or less credibility if she is clearly identified with one kind of client?

In thinking about the question of attorney sincerity, it is helpful to imagine the two extremes of practice: the hired gun (or, more positively, the taxi cab driver) who will argue anything within the bounds of the law and ethical rules, and the “true believer,”¹⁵² always convinced of the righteousness of his or her position.

The hired gun or taxicab is more in line with the traditional professional ideal. The ethical canons emphasized, “The obligation of loyalty to the client applies only to a lawyer in the discharge of professional duties and implies no obligation to adopt a personal viewpoint favorable to the interests or desires of the client.”¹⁵³ This view has been repeated in the Restatement,¹⁵⁴ and Model Rules. Independence and detachment from client causes are part of the character of the honorable lawyer put forth by Chief Justice Roberts at his confirmation hearings.¹⁵⁵

¹⁵⁰ “Personal plight” cases have been defined as criminal defense, personal injury plaintiffs work and divorce. John P. Heinz, Edward O. Laumann, Robert L. Nelson, & Ethan Michelson, The Changing Character of Lawyers’ Work, 32 Law and Society Rev. 751, 760 (1998).

¹⁵¹ This recurring debate surfaced again with the nomination of Judge John Roberts to the Supreme Court. See Anne E. Kornblut, Week in Review, The Nation: Judging John Roberts; The Briefcase Carries Briefs, Not Necessarily Ideologies, N.Y. TIMES, Aug. 15, 2005, § 4, at 5 (discussing whether lawyers should be held accountable for the positions they advocate on behalf of clients).

¹⁵² “True Believer” was also the name of a 1989 movie about a former civil rights lawyer who ended up defending drug dealers. TRUE BELIEVER (Columbia Pictures, 1989). See also Carl M. Selinger, Dramatizing on Film the Uneasy Role of the American Criminal Defense Lawyer: True Believer, 22 OKLA. CITY U. L. REV. 223 (1997). When I practiced criminal defense law this term was frequently used to describe dedicated defense attorneys who were always completely convinced of the correctness of opposing the prosecution, and contrasted to those more agnostic attorneys who could often see the merits of their opponents’ position.

The hired gun attorney certainly has his critics. Richard Wasserstrom has criticized the lawyer’s role differentiated morality and specifically the practice of arguing positions in which the lawyer does not believe: “If the lawyer does not in fact believe what is urged by way of argument, if the lawyer is only playing a role, then it appears to be proper to tax the lawyer with hypocrisy and insincerity. To be sure, actors in a play take on roles and say things that the characters, not the actors, believe. But we know it is a play and that they are actors. The law courts are not, however, theaters, and the lawyers both talk about justice and they genuinely seek to persuade. The fact that the lawyer’s words, thoughts, and convictions are, apparently, for sale and at the service of the client helps us, I think, to understand the peculiar hostility which is more than occasionally uniquely directed by lay persons toward lawyers.”¹⁵⁶ Wasserstrom argues that the lawyer pays a heavy price for living this way.

At the other end of the continuum from the hired gun, the “true believer” identifies strongly with the client’s cause. Some true believers are motivated by pre-existing political beliefs.¹⁵⁷ Others may come to identify with their clients as a result of representing them over time. In the end the lawyer who began as a hired gun persuades

¹⁵³ MODEL CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY EC 7-17 (1980)

¹⁵⁴ “Moreover, it is a tradition that a lawyer’s advocacy for a client should not be construed as an expression of the lawyer’s personal views.” Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 125, cmt. e (2005).

¹⁵⁵ See note 3, supra.

¹⁵⁶ Richard Wasserstrom, Lawyers as Professionals: Some Moral Issues, 5 Human Rights, 1-15 (1975), reprinted in THE LEGAL PROFESSION: RESPONSIBILITY AND REGULATION 159 (Geoffrey Hazard and Deborah L. Rhode, 3d ed., 1994).

¹⁵⁷ Legal services lawyers, for example, may be drawn to their jobs by their strong beliefs in social justice. Once there, a true believer will take on an identity and “mission” to which their arguments must conform. See Peter Margulies, Multiple Communities or Monolithic Clients: Positional Conflicts of Interest and the Mission of the Legal Services Lawyer, 67 FORDHAM L. REV. 2339 (1999). “Cause lawyers” are “activist lawyers who use the law as a means of creating social change in addition to a means of helping individual clients...The worry for the cause lawyer is that the pursuit of her ‘cause’ may at times conflict with her client’s interest.” Margareth Etienne, The Ethics of Cause Lawyering: An Empirical Examination of Criminal Defense Lawyers as Cause Lawyers, 95 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1195 (2005).

him or herself of the client's position. As one commentator suggests, "one way that lawyers deal with the problem of opportunism is to come to believe in the arguments they make on behalf of their clients. For example, defenders of tobacco companies may come to believe that the hazards of smoking really have not been demonstrated sufficiently."¹⁵⁸ Another observer suggests that many lawyers "do not perceive any disjunction between personal morality and professional identitySuch lawyers may improperly discount their professional obligations to third parties by so closely identifying with their clients' ends and interests."¹⁵⁹

Although the "true believer" is sincere—unlike the hired gun—she can also be perceived as a menace because she lacks detachment and professionalism. Writing in opposition to the 2000 changes to the Model Rule comments on positional conflicts, a family law lawyer and judge claimed that positional conflicts rules would "deprive the court, and the legal system, of the objectivity that the representation of both classes of parties provides in this particularly emotion-laden field Lawyers will undoubtedly do a better job of dispute resolution if they do not practice or model polarized thinking, which, after all, is recognized in mental health circles to be a thought disorder."¹⁶⁰

Rather than advocating the ethics of a true believer, many writers defend the lawyer's role-differentiated ethics of argument.¹⁶¹ Yet they also acknowledge the accusations of

¹⁵⁸ J. M. Balkin, Ideological Drift and the Struggle over Meaning, 25 CONN. L. REV. 869, 887 n.24 (1993). He goes on to say, "Of course, this is a solution to the problem of opportunism only if one believes that reduction of cognitive dissonance by itself counts as a solution. Moreover, it cannot serve as a solution for the lawyer who continually represents clients with contradictory interests. Such a lawyer is more likely to come to believe in the process rather than the client—that zealous representation of whatever client is before her is adequate justification for her actions. The repeated experience of being a hired gun causes her to believe in the propriety of being a hired gun."

¹⁵⁹ Norman W. Spaulding, The Prophet and the Bureaucrat: Positional conflicts in Service Pro Bono Publico, 50 STAN. L. REV. 1395, 1429 (1998); Karl Llewellyn, too, noted the ease with which lawyers come to believe in the justness of their clients' causes, especially when the clients' cases are particularly profitable. KARL LLEWELLYN, THE BRAMBLE BUSH: ON OUR LAW AND ITS STUDY 178 (Oceana, 1930).

¹⁶⁰ Walther, supra note 46, at 138.

¹⁶¹ Note Hazard, supra note 54 at § 10.10, illustration 10-2, discussion of a positional conflict before the same judge: "Although some might say that the spectacle of the same lawyer arguing both sides of the same proposition damages the image of the legal profession, it can also be said that it instead shows the profession at its best. So long as there are non-frivolous arguments to be made, lawyers should be proud to acknowledge that as detached professionals they are capable of asserting either side." With respect to legal education, Anthony Kronman defends the case method as teaching students to entertain multiple positions, "strengthening their moral imagination and encouraging them to take a more cosmopolitan view of the dishonesty that will not go away. James Boyd White has written an eloquent defense of the advocate who does not necessarily endorse his client's cause.¹⁶² In a dialogue based on Plato's Georgias, the lawyers' defender states that while he may be "insincere" in a certain sense when making an argument, he is nevertheless honest because the judges and other advocates understand his role. He argues that he acts with integrity because his implicit and honest statement is that this is the best argument he can make for his client given his resources.¹⁶³ At the same time, White gives voice to the contrary argument that a lawyer is little better than a prostitute who serves neither his client's best interests nor justice. (218-219). Geoffrey Hazard writes that while it is "profoundly unattractive" to admit that the advocate's presentation is a theatrical enterprise rather than the lawyer's honest assessment of the case, requiring lawyers to take on the truth finding function of the judge would not result in justice.¹⁶⁴ Yet he acknowledges that many involved are unhappy with the theatrical role-playing: "The judges are unhappy knowing that the best they can get is verisimilitude. . . . Many lay critics and some academicians condemn both the advocates' artifice and the artificers, without coming to terms with the fundamental difficulty that begets the role of advocate in the first place."¹⁶⁵ These comments reflect a widespread discomfort with the adversarial process to which we are nevertheless committed.

On the spectrum between hired gun and true believer, most lawyers probably fall somewhere in the middle or travel between the poles. Most advocates acknowledge the importance of demonstrating a belief in one's case in order to be persuasive.¹⁶⁶ Yet several also warn against the danger of becoming too closely identified with the case: "Once a lawyer starts crusading, he loses the objectivity he needs, he begins to slop over, diversity of human goods . . ." ANTHONY T. KRONMAN, THE LOST LAWYER 160 (1993). He notes that many students experience this education as unmooring them from their former ideals. Id.

¹⁶² JAMES BOYD WHITE, HERACLES' BOW: ESSAYS ON THE RHETORIC AND POETICS OF THE LAW 215-237 (1985).

¹⁶³ Id. at 225.

¹⁶⁴ Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., Law Practice and the Limits of Moral Philosophy, in ETHICS IN PRACTICE 83, (Deborah L. Rhode, ed., 2000).

¹⁶⁵ Id., at 83.

¹⁶⁶ GERRY SPENCE, HOW TO ARGUE AND WIN EVERY TIME 58-59 (1995); DAVID C. FREDERICK, THE ART OF ORAL ADVOCACY 33 (2003); FREDERICK BERNAYS WEINER, BRIEFING AND ARGUING FEDERAL APPEALS 359 (1967).

he rapidly diminishes his effectiveness, and he becomes that stock, hackneyed and yet constantly reappearing character, the lawyer who represents himself and who in consequence has a fool for a client.”¹⁶⁷ When advocates discuss the need to have a belief in the correctness of one’s case, they often discuss how to induce this belief through preparation.¹⁶⁸ The “sincere belief” of the advocate comes to resemble the sincere beliefs that an actor conveys after similar preparation.

Thus, there is far from unanimity on the proper attitude of the attorney toward the sincerity of his or her position. Karl Llewellyn has suggested that there is no agreement on the proper attitude because all lawyers are sometimes happy with the hired gun ethic and sometimes earnest believers in their clients’ causes. He told law students in his 1930 lecture, that the two ethical norms are “completely respectable, accepted, impeccable, and either of which is always available,” depending on which appears convenient to the lawyer at the time.¹⁶⁹ This ambivalence makes it difficult to develop a clear rule for lawyer credibility with positional conflicts, and may help explain the varying approaches taken by different jurisdictions. Nevertheless, a positional conflict will raise credibility questions even for the staunchest defenders of the hired gun or taxicab ethic. These problems will arise with three principle audiences: the court(s), clients, and the public.

The Court. “[T]he most important object of inquiry in a study of persuasion is not the author but the audience to whom the argument is addressed. After all, those who make arguments, whether manipulatively or with conviction, do so in order to influence others.”¹⁷⁰ Judges well understand that lawyers are not necessarily arguing in accord with their personal opinions when they take a position in court. At least one bar ethics opinion declined to find that appellate judges would be prejudiced against either side when presented with opposing arguments by the same firm: “Appellate judges are presumably trained to recognize that advocates are often required to take positions contrary to those previously taken by their partners, when the interests of a client so ¹⁶⁷ Weiner, supra note 166, at 357.

¹⁶⁸ Spence, supra note 166; Frederick, supra note 166, at 34; Weiner, supra note 166.

¹⁶⁹ Llewellyn, supra note 159, at 180.

¹⁷⁰ Jerry Frug, Argument as Character, 40 STAN. L. REV. 869, 881 (1988)

require.”¹⁷¹ Hazard and Hodes, by defending the ethics of a pure legal positional conflict before the same judge, also seem to assume that the advocate’s credibility will not suffer with the court.¹⁷²

But several authorities and commentators state the opposite: that consciously or subconsciously, judges will question the credibility of an advocate who makes contrary legal arguments before the same tribunal.¹⁷³ Other sources, while they do not expressly comment on a loss of credibility before the court, seem to assume such a problem when they draw the ethical line at presenting opposing arguments in the same court.¹⁷⁴

Could any credibility problem from a positional conflict be eliminated by mutual agreement between bench and bar that a positional conflict poses no ethical concern? That is, if we all agreed that lawyers should be allowed to argue contrary positions—even in the same court—would judges adopt Hazard’s position that to argue contrary positions actually shows the profession in its noblest light? It is unlikely that the profession could get rid of the entire credibility problem in this way.¹⁷⁵ The practice of law is not like a moot court competition or debate round. Judges in real cases are trying to decide what is right—it is a serious enterprise, “take[ing] place in a field of pain and death.”¹⁷⁶ Given the seriousness of the enterprise, most judges will (unconsciously or not) prefer lawyers who at least appear to also be serious as well. Nevertheless, if there were mutual agreement, as apparently existed in the Nineteenth Century, it could greatly diminish the credibility problems associated with a positional conflict.

¹⁷¹ Arizona Ethics Opinion No. 87-15 (1987).

¹⁷² Hazard, supra note 54, at 10-33.

¹⁷³ ABA Comm. On Ethics and Prof’l Responsibility, Formal Op. 93-377 (1993); Dzienkowski, supra note 13, at 489-90; Aprile, supra note 138 at 58..

¹⁷⁴ See Part III (C), supra.

¹⁷⁵ In an article criticizing the rule against lawyers vouching for clients, Thomas L. Shaffer argues that modern American lawyers have attempted unsuccessfully to take the character of the advocate out of advocacy, mostly in order to prevent the inconvenient consequences of vouching on lawyer’s careers. These consequences include that lawyers would have to vouch in every case or the courts would wonder at the absence of vouching, and that lawyers who were not known in the community would have a disadvantage. Thomas L. Shaffer, The Legal Profession’s Rule Against Vouching for Clients: Advocacy and “The Manner That is The Man Himself”, 7 NOTRE DAME J. L. ETHICS AND PUB. POL’Y 145, 158-59(1993). Shaffer argues that it is impossible to remove the influence of the advocate’s character.

¹⁷⁶ Robert Cover, Violence and the Word, 95 YALE L.J. 1601 (1986).

Some credibility problem will remain, however, because of the importance of ethos or character in argument. While “[t]he daily experience of using arguments and counterarguments interchangeably gives lawyers and judges such a distant (sometimes cynical) attitude toward arguments that their arguments often seem characterless,”¹⁷⁷ character is nevertheless important.¹⁷⁸ As Aristotle wrote, “Persuasion is achieved by the speaker’s personal character when the speech is so spoken as to make us think him credible. We believe good men more fully and more readily than others: this is true generally whatever the question is, and absolutely true where exact certainty is impossible and opinions are divided.”¹⁷⁹ An effective argument causes the listener or reader to identify with the character of the advocate.¹⁸⁰ If the character of the advocate is that of a chameleon who can argue two sides of the same question, how will that character help persuade the decision-maker? To the extent argument is based on a particular type of character (champion of entrepreneur, defender of the little guy) can these two types be credibly represented by same person or same firm? Is it too much to ask the court to see it as a performance? Is not the very two-facedness of the positional conflict revealing of a bad character?¹⁸¹

When discussing an advocate’s character, one might refer to character in a number of senses: reputational character the advocate brings with herself, the character of the advocate revealed through the argument, and the character of the argument itself. The lines between these different kinds of character will not always be clear, and character itself can be multidimensional and always changing. (frug) Reputational character might include such things as the speaker’s background, education, and firm association. Justice Blackmun’s notes on oral arguments demonstrate that this kind of character could ¹⁷⁷ Frug, supra note 170, at 896.

¹⁷⁸ Frug, supra note 170; Amanda Anderson, The Way We Argue Now (2006)

¹⁷⁹ ARISTOTLE, RHETORIC 7 (W. Rhys Roberts, trans., 2004).

¹⁸⁰ Frug, supra note 170.

¹⁸¹ By several accounts, the Solicitor General and his attorneys have the highest credibility as advocates before the Supreme Court. See, e.g., Rebecca Deen & Joseph Ignagni, Individual Justices and the Solicitor General: The Amicus Curiae Cases, 1953-2000, 89 Judicature 68, 69 (2005); Kelly J. Lynch, Best Friends? Supreme Court Law Clerks on Effective Amicus Curiae Briefs, 20 J.L. & Pol. 33, 47 (2004). One important reason for that credibility is probably that the Solicitor General’s positions are the considered positions of the executive branch, and not paid for by private actors. (Of course, some will argue that these positions are influenced by powerful private interests). The Solicitor General’s office cannot have a positional conflict because it has only one client.

definitely influence his assessment of credibility.¹⁸² But the argument itself, as Aristotle noted, will also reveal character. Even the most stellar reputation and background will not make up for an argument that is churlish, sullen or disrespectful. Finally, the terms of the argument itself may appeal to a certain kind of character: authoritarian, vengeful, merciful, etc. A positional conflict will not necessarily diminish the lawyer's performance of character in all of these senses, but it might affect the court's acceptance of that performance.

No matter what one's position on whether a good lawyer must believe what she says, the sense of commitment is an important asset for an advocate. Judges committed to an ethic of independence can ignore positional conflicts up to a point, but the advocate's credibility will suffer—or at least the advocate will lose a strategic asset—if judge is faced with the same lawyer arguing opposing positions. To a lesser extent this might also be true if two lawyers from the same firm take opposing positions.¹⁸³

Yet, while these credibility problems can never be completely eliminated, removing the ethical rule against positional conflicts could reduce them greatly. If the profession were to unequivocally endorse the character of the taxi-driver, the honest advocate, as it did ¹⁸² See generally Linda Greenhouse, Becoming Justice Blackmun, (2005), showing that Blackmun graded oral argument performances. Political scientists who have analyzed his grades show a strong connection between the advocate's social status (background, education, status of employer) and Blackmun's grade. Timothy R. Johnson, Paul J. Wahlbeck, James F. Spriggs, II, Legal Argumentation before the U.S. Supreme Court, at 29-30. Paper prepared for presentation at the 2004 annual meetings of the American Political Science Association, Chicago, IL, September 2-5. One reason for this reputational advantage might be that advocates who went to Ivy League schools and practiced with large Washington firms were more like the justices themselves and therefore easier for the justices to identify with. Frug, supra note 172 (on the importance of identifying with the speaker).

¹⁸³ Given the importance of credibility to advocacy, should the impairment to credibility caused by a positional conflict be analyzed as a threat to lawyer competence? In some ways competency seems like a better analysis than conflict of interest because the problems with credibility are strategic. But competency refers to "the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation," MODEL CODE OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 1.1 (2004), and it would seem to be a stretch to include credibility within that definition. See California Ethics Opinion No. 1989-108 (rejecting argument that positional conflict violates competency rule) and Maine Ethics Opinion No. 155 (1997) (finding no per se conflict of interest from a positional conflict, but suggesting that a contemporaneous positional conflict before the same court could impair the lawyer's effectiveness to the extent that it would violate the duty to employ "reasonable care and skill.") more fully in Senator Carpenter's time, the credibility problems associated with positional conflicts would lessen.

The Client. A client is unlikely to understand why he or she should tolerate a positional conflict, especially in the same court. Perhaps some clients can be made to understand the value of an independent bar, but most will want a lawyer who is not at cross-purposes with their case. To a client, a lawyer with a positional conflict will seem not be an entirely loyal advocate.

Given this credibility problem with clients, do clients even need to be told about positional conflicts? If a positional conflict is not a real conflict of interest, as I've argued, then there is no ethical requirement under the Model Rules that clients be told about it. But as a practical matter, and as a courtesy to clients, it is good policy to inform clients of significant positional conflicts, especially those that a client will likely discover in any event, such as those where a victory for one client will result in adverse precedent for the other. The California Ethics committee opinion suggests that there might even be malpractice liability if harm to the client "might have been avoided by timely disclosure" of the positional conflict.¹⁸⁴

The Public. Lawyers already have significant credibility problems with the public, and many lawyer jokes seem based on the lawyer's lack of honesty.¹⁸⁵ The negative effect of even a factual positional conflict was a primary concern of the court in *Estates Theatres, Inc., v. Columbia Pictures Indus.*¹⁸⁶ The public is not impressed with the ethic of "independence" when lawyers talk out of both sides of their mouths.¹⁸⁷

¹⁸⁴ California Ethics Opinion 1989-108 at 4.

¹⁸⁵ E.g., Q: How can you tell when a lawyer is lying? A: His lips are moving. Q: What happens when a lawyer dies? A: He lies still.

¹⁸⁶ See note 53, supra.

¹⁸⁷ For example, when the well-known lawyer Edward Bennett Williams made one characterization of this client's sentence to the court and another to the press, one reporter wrote in disgust, "Words for hire. Words not for expression but for manipulation. Words that do not emanate from some deep and honest center of a man, but rather from a bag of tricks well learned." Jack Fuller, Words for hire add a disturbing note to the Helms case, CHI. TRIB., Nov. 13, 1977 (quoted in Robert Pack, Edward Bennett Williams for the Defense, 37 (1983)).

The Lawyer's self-respect (credibility with self). Although many lawyers and bar associations have shown themselves reluctant to adopt a strict rule against positional conflicts, few attorneys would probably feel comfortable presenting starkly conflicting arguments, especially to the same court. Lawyers will differ on the level of discomfort, just as commentators differ on whether sincerity is important to the lawyer's work. But for many lawyers, if the positional conflict involves an issue important to the case, it will be difficult to achieve that state of "sincere belief" that many say is necessary for effective advocacy.¹⁸⁸

Not only would a positional conflict make adequate preparation difficult for most lawyers, but it would be demoralizing for many to have their opportunism so starkly exposed. Most lawyers prefer to align their economic interests with their pocketbooks, as Llewellyn said, and come to believe in the rightness of their cases. That belief will be difficult with a positional conflict, unless one comes to believe in the rightness of the being a hired gun or taxicab.¹⁸⁹

Where a positional conflict is imputed between firm members, rather than with a single lawyer, the problem of credibility with the lawyer self disappears in most instances.

D. An Example: the Public Defender

It may be helpful to take a particular case of a positional conflict in advocacy to understand how a positional conflict might work. The recent Delaware case, Williams v. State,¹⁹⁰ provides a good example. The positional conflict in that case was apparently a stark legal one. The court described the conflict as follows:

[The lawyer] asserts that, on appeal, Williams could raise an arguable issue that the Superior Court erred when it concluded it was required to give "great weight" to the jury's 10-2 recommendation in favor of the death penalty for Williams. [The lawyer] contends, however, that he may have a conflict in presenting this argument because he has advocated a contrary position on behalf of a different client in another capital murder appeal pending before this Court. In Garden v. State, Nos. 125 & 162, 2001, [the lawyer] argued in his opening brief that the Superior Court erred when it failed to give great weight to the jury's 2-10 vote rejecting the imposition of the death penalty for Garden.

¹⁸⁸ Weiner, supra note 166; Federal Defenders of San Diego, Inc., v. United States, supra note 101, at 30.

¹⁸⁹ Roberts, Confirmation Hearings, supra note 3.

¹⁹⁰ 805 A.2d 880 (Del. 2002).

The lawyer in this case was a public defender who had no business conflict between the two capital clients.¹⁹¹ Neither case would be more profitable than the other; neither client paid for the representation. Thus the real concern in representing both clients was the lawyer's credibility. Along with the traditional concern with creating adverse precedent for one client, the lawyer cited concerns about his credibility with the court and his clients.¹⁹²

The credibility problem is especially acute for a public defender, whose credibility is somewhat tarnished to being with. The public defender does not choose her cases, and there is a widespread impression—both with the public and many on the bench—that most of her clients are guilty. The ethical rules on attorney truthfulness and avoiding frivolous claims properly include exceptions for criminal defense counsel in light of the criminal defendant's constitutional rights,¹⁹³ and the danger to these rights if counsel became too concerned with avoiding frivolous arguments. But one effect of relaxing rules for truthfulness and frivolity for criminal defense counsel is that the credibility of defense counsel may be undermined. Courts may assume that an attorney is simply “going through the motions” in a particular case, regardless of whether the attorney is ¹⁹¹ confirmed in interview with Bernard J. O'Donnell, supra note 101.

¹⁹² “O'Donnell is concerned that his representation of both clients on this issue will create the risk that an unfavorable precedent will be created for one client or the other. O'Donnell also is concerned that it may invite questions about his credibility with this Court and his clients' perception of his loyalty to each of them.” 805 A.2d at 881.

¹⁹³ See MODEL CODE OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 3.1 (2004) (prohibiting frivolous claims and defenses, but allowing criminal defense lawyers to require proof of every element of a crime); MODEL CODE OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 3.3, cmt. 6-10 (2004) (discussing the different possible approaches for criminal defense counsel, as distinguished from other lawyers, when false evidence has been offered).

arguing in all sincerity. Thus, a public defender cannot afford any additional credibility problem that a positional conflict might add.

The public defender's credibility with clients can also be strained since the client cannot choose or fire the attorney. A dedicated public defender can overcome initial client skepticism by demonstrating her commitment and competence, but a positional conflict will certainly undermine those efforts.

The public defender's self-respect (credibility with herself) is also an important concern. The public defender does not choose her cases, and part of the ethic of public defense is the idea that everyone deserves constitutional due process and a good defense. Most public defenders believe that their work is honorable, whether their clients are guilty or not. They do not judge or turn down clients. But to have a positional conflict forced upon them may be too much for this sense of honor and self-respect, especially if they believe it undermines their credibility with their audience and clients.

In Williams, the state supported the attorney's motion to withdraw, and the court allowed it. This was proper, and courts should grant such motions even were the state to oppose them.¹⁹⁴ One reason to grant such motions is that although the credibility problem is very real for a public defender, the client(s) will have no way to challenge the positional conflict's effect on their case. Unlike paying criminal clients or civil clients, a public defense client cannot fire the attorney to prevent the positional conflict from materializing, even if the client comes to know of the problem in time. Nor will the client have any post-trial remedy. A positional conflict will probably not rise to the level of ineffective assistance of counsel in violation of the Sixth Amendment, despite the Delaware court's statement that the attorney's positional conflict "may compromise the effectiveness of his assistance as appellate counsel."¹⁹⁵

¹⁹⁴ The court in Federal Defenders of San Diego, Inc., v. United States Sentencing Commission also advised that public defenders who were uncomfortable with a positional conflict be allowed to withdraw. 680 F.Supp. at 30.

¹⁹⁵ 805 A.2d at 882.

To show a violation of the Sixth Amendment through ineffective assistance of counsel, the defendant must show (1) deficient performance, and (2) prejudice, that the outcome of the proceeding more probably than not would have been different.¹⁹⁶ It is notoriously difficult to show ineffective assistance: convictions with drunk, sleeping, or unlicensed lawyers have all been upheld.¹⁹⁷ Even if one could show that proceeding with a purely legal positional conflict was deficient performance—a difficult showing given the disagreement among authorities as to whether such a conflict is an ethical violation—it will be impossible to show prejudice in most cases. If the prejudice claim is based on impaired credibility, courts will presume that judges are able to look past any credibility issue presented.¹⁹⁸ If the claim of prejudice is based on the creation of adverse precedent, it will also be impossible to show that the court would have reached a different result had different counsel been representing each case.

One might argue that a defendant asserting ineffective assistance of counsel based on a positional conflict should not have to show prejudice. Where a claim of ineffective assistance is based on a conflict of interest adversely affecting performance, prejudice need not be shown.¹⁹⁹ But with such claims the defendant must nevertheless show the adverse effect on performance. Again, it will be difficult to show exactly how the conflict adversely affected the arguments made.²⁰⁰

Because a later challenge to the conviction based on a positional conflict is unlikely to succeed, but the credibility impairment may be real, courts should grant appointed counsel motions to withdraw for positional conflicts. There is little danger of abuse: the ¹⁹⁷ See, e.g. Burdine v. Johnson, 262 F.3d 336 (5th Cir. 2001) (attorney sleeping in the courtroom); White v. State, 664 So.2d 242 (1995) (attorney inebriated and under the influence of narcotics); Smith v. Ylst, 826 F.2d 872 (9th Cir. 1987) (attorney suffering from mental illness); See also Jeffrey L. Kirchemeyer, Drink Drugs, and Drowsiness: The Constitutional Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel and the Strickland Prejudice Requirement, 75 NEB. L. REV. 425 (1996).

¹⁹⁶ Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 104 S.Ct. 2052 (1984).

¹⁹⁸ See Arizona Ethics Opinion No. 87-15 (1987).

¹⁹⁹ United States v. Schwarz, 283 F.3d 76 (2nd Cir. 2002)

²⁰⁰ The defendant might show an adverse effect based on timing of arguments, delays that put one case ahead of the other, etc. See Dzienkowski, supra note 14. But where there are other explanations for the timing, it will be hard to show the effect of the conflict. If the defendant could show an economic reason for the lawyer to prefer one case over the other, and that the preference caused the timing decisions, he could perhaps show a conflict with the lawyer's self-interest. See Schwarz, supra note 199. But absent such a conflict, he will have a tough time.

moving attorney would have to show the conflict to the court. Direct legal positional conflicts, especially in the same court, are likely to be rare. In addition, such conflicts need not be imputed. Because the chief concern is with the lawyer's credibility, not with financial incentives or divided loyalties, public defenders from the same agency should be allowed to take contrary positions on legal questions.²⁰¹ Thus the impact of a policy to grant such motions to withdraw should be minimal.

For the same reasons that counsel's motion to withdraw should be granted, public defenders should tell their clients about a positional conflict so that the client might also protest—an argument after the fact will be too late. Because the positional conflict is not a true conflict of interest, the client therefore has no right under the ethics rules or the constitution to demand a lawyer without a positional conflict. But if a client objects strenuously, the lawyer could move to withdraw in the interests of client relations, or a court might grant the client's motion for substitution of counsel.

Yet while such motions should be granted, it would not be advisable to make withdrawal mandatory where the attorney has a positional conflict. Just as the rule against positional conflicts seems to have caused civil lawyers and firms to suppress such conflicts in various ways, a more rigid rule against positional conflicts even for public defenders might cause an abundance of caution that could deprive clients of good quality counsel. In many jurisdictions, the supply of good public defenders is limited, and conflict counsel might not always be of similar quality.²⁰² The assumption behind the conflict of interest rules—that good lawyers are like busses²⁰³—is simply not warranted, especially for poor clients.²⁰⁴

V. Proposal to Amend Model Rule 1.7 Comment 22

²⁰¹ Aprile, supra note 173, at 57. “Indeed, when two individual public defenders are arguing contrary legal positions in separate cases, the integrity and independence of the defender agency is apparent.”

²⁰² ACLU OF WA REPORT ON INDIGENT DEFENSE, supra note 10. The report provides another reason not to require public defenders to withdraw for positional conflicts. However ill-advised, it is not uncommon for public defense contracts to penalize the recognition of a conflict of interest so that the contractor must pay for any conflict counsel out of the contract fee. Just as with private civil attorneys, with such contracts a rule against positional conflicts can create a financial reason to suppress the conflicting legal argument.

²⁰³ . . . another one will be along in a few minutes.

²⁰⁴ See criticisms of Fiandaca, supra note 93.

The current comment on positional conflicts, comment 22 to Model Rule 1.7, should be amended to say:

“Ordinarily a lawyer may take inconsistent legal positions on behalf of different clients. The mere fact that advocating a legal position on behalf of one client might create precedent adverse to the interests of a client represented by the lawyer in an unrelated matter does not create a conflict of interest.²⁰⁵ Regardless whether a lawyer actually takes inconsistent legal positions in different cases, if the legal arguments in unrelated cases are connected in such a way that a lawyer is under pressure to shape, modify or drop arguments in one case in light of the other case, the lawyer needs to assess whether there is a significant risk that the representation of either or both case[s] will be materially limited. Lawyers cannot always avoid such pressure in their practice, but they should not undertake representation that creates such pressure if they are unable to withstand it.

“If a lawyer determines to argue contrary legal positions in unrelated cases, the lawyer should consider the credibility implications with respect to the court, clients, the public and the lawyer self. Where the inconsistent positions involve issues important to the cases, and especially where the positions are advocated in the same jurisdiction, the prudent attorney will inform the affected clients.

“Especially where it is a single attorney, rather than different attorneys in a firm, presenting contrary legal arguments, a court should grant an attorney’s motion to withdraw for credibility concerns. But the attorney should not be required to withdraw.”

This proposal would change the current comment in several important ways. First, it removes the suggestion that a legal positional conflict by itself can be a conflict of interest in violation of the Model Rules. Second, it would advise lawyers to consider the risk of material impairment of representation from reconciling, modifying or dropping arguments in one case to please or keep another client. The current comment only advises lawyers to scrutinize positional conflicts—a faulty indicator of conflict of interest. The proposal would also advise the lawyer to consider the credibility implications of a positional conflict, and to inform the clients where the arguments are sufficiently important and likely to affect credibility. The current comment does not address credibility. Finally, the proposed comment advises that a lawyer’s request to withdraw because of credibility concerns should be respected, even though the lawyer cannot be required to withdraw as there should be no ethical prohibition against positional conflicts.

²⁰⁵ This first sentence is in the current version of comment 22.

VI. Conclusion

It is not easy to craft a rule since the positional conflict sits astride a fault-line of fundamental ambivalence in law practice and theory about lawyer sincerity, loyalty and independence. The absence of litigation about positional conflicts and the evidence of the much greater force of business conflicts suggests that a stronger prohibition of positional conflicts is not advisable. A positional conflict is actually a faulty indicator of a conflict of interest—the real harm is when a lawyer succumbs to pressure to drop or change arguments in one case in order not to harm another client or case. But while a rule against positional conflicts is therefore counterproductive, counsel’s decision to withdraw in the face of a positional conflict should be respected

Positional conflicts can raise credibility concerns for individual lawyers and firms, despite the widely held professional ideal of independence, an ideal that is consistent with lawyers arguing both sides of a legal issue in unrelated cases. Because of the importance of the advocate’s character or ethos to argument, a lawyer arguing both sides of a legal issue may present a diminished sense of commitment to the case—affecting credibility with the court, the clients and possibly the public. The example of the public defender, whose clients are powerless and who may not withdraw without court permission, illustrates these credibility problems. While these credibility concerns do not rise to the level of ethical violations, the prudent lawyer will carefully consider them in determining whether to proceed with a positional conflict.