

Milan Markovic
1114 Rhode Island NW
Washington, DC 20005
March 24, 2006

Forced Pregnancy and the ICC

Introduction

The International Criminal Court (ICC) is the first tribunal to criminalize forced pregnancy.¹ The Court's statute defines forced pregnancy as "the unlawful confinement of a woman forcibly made pregnant, with the intent of affecting the ethnic composition of any population or carrying out other violations of international law."² Although the concept of a forced pregnancy crime is relatively new,³ forced impregnation has been used throughout history as a tool of assimilation or subjugation of the enemy, minority, or slave populations.⁴ There is some evidence that the ancient Athenians used it as part of their genocide of the Melians for example,⁵ and in more recent times thousands of outcast children were born as a result of the rapes of Bengali women by the West Pakistani army in 1971.⁶

Nevertheless, it was not until the mass rapes in Bosnia and Rwanda caught the attention of feminist legal scholars⁷ that forced pregnancy began to capture the public

¹ Kristen Boon, Rape and Forced Pregnancy Under the ICC Statute: Human Dignity, Autonomy, and Consent, 32 COLUM. HUM. RTS. L. REV. 625, 656 (2001).

² Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, art. 7 (2)(f), Jul. 1, 2002, U.N. Doc A/Conf.183/9, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90, available at <http://www.un.org/law/icc> [hereinafter ICC Statute].

³ Boon, supra note 1, at 656.

⁴ Roybn Charli Carpenter, Forced Maternity: Children's Rights and the Genocide Convention, 2 J. GENOCIDE RES. 213, 223 (2000).

⁵ Id. at 223 n.36.

⁶ Id.

⁷ "Overnight, it seemed, that plight of Bosnian women had become a domestic issue to American feminists." R. Charli Carpenter, Surfacing Children: Limitations of Genocidal Rape Discourse, 22 HUM.

consciousness.⁸ Estimates vary but victims of rape gave birth to an estimated 2,000 - 5,000 “children of hate” in Rwanda and perhaps 400 -600 in Bosnia.⁹ In Bosnia, particularly, commentators have alleged that Serbs had a systematic plan to impregnate Croatian and Muslim women and force them to bear Chetnik (i.e. Serb) babies.¹⁰ Catherine MacKinnon railed against a legal system that made states lack of protection for women internationally protected.¹¹

Against this backdrop, feminist groups united to create the Women’s Caucus for Gender Justice in the ICC (“Women’s Caucus”).¹² The Women’s Caucus was enormously influential during the planning phases of the ICC, and over the fierce opposition of some states, was successful in arguing for the inclusion of forced pregnancy in the ICC Statute.¹³ While the ICC has not yet tried its first case, the court has gone far beyond any other international tribunal in recognizing crimes committed against women.¹⁴

Despite the optimism that surrounds the ICC and its recognition of forced

RTS. Q. 428, 431 (2000); see also, e.g., Catharine A. MacKinnon, Rape, Genocide, and Women’s Human Rights, 17 HARV. WOMEN’S L.J. 5 (1994); BEVERLY ALLEN, RAPE WARFARE: THE HIDDEN GENOCIDE IN BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA AND CROATIA (Univ. of Minnesota Press 1996); Siobhan Fisher, Occupation of the Womb: Forced Impregnation as Genocide, 46 DUKE L.J. 73 (1996).

⁸ See generally Carpenter, supra note 4, at 223.

⁹ Id.

¹⁰ Todd A. Salzman, Rape Camps as a Means of Ethnic Cleansing: Religious, Cultural, and Ethical Responses to Rape Victims in the Former Yugoslavia, 20 HUM. RTS. Q. 348, 359 (1998); ALLEN, supra note 7, at 61-65.

¹¹ MacKinnon, supra note 7, at 12; see also Veronica C. Abreu, Women’s Bodies as Battlefields, 6 GEO. J. GENDER & L. 1, 11 (2005) (“The current international legal framework inadequately addresses the realities of . . . sexual terrorism.”).

¹² See Rana Lehr-Lehnardt, One Small Step for Women: Female-Friendly Provisions in the Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court, 16 BYU J. PUB. L. 317, 352 (2002); see also Marlies Glasius, How Activists Shaped the Court, Crimes of War Project (Dec. 2003), at http://www.crimesofwar.org/icc_magazine/icc-glasius.html.

¹³ See Glasius, supra note 12; see also Lehr-Lehnardt, supra note 12, at 352; Alessandra Stanley, Semantics Stalls Pact Labeling Rape a War Crime, N.Y. TIMES, July 9, 1998, at A3.

¹⁴ See, e.g., Lehr-Lehnardt, supra note 12, at 353; Boon, supra note 1, at 673; see also Tina Karkera, The International Criminal Court’s Protection of Women: The Hands of Justice at Work, 12 AM. U. J. GENDER SOC. POL’Y & L. 197, 198 (2004).

pregnancy, little attention has been paid to how the crime will be prosecuted. In this article, I will examine the potential difficulties associated with prosecuting forced pregnancy. In Part I, I examine the ambiguities in the definition of forced pregnancy as well as the mens rea and act reus of the crime. A particular problem is that ICC definition “shall not in anyway be interpreted as affecting national laws related to pregnancy.”¹⁵ Is it possible to make sense of “forced pregnancy” without in some sense recognizing a women’s fundamental right to terminate her pregnancy? In Part II, I will address the different contexts in which forced pregnancy can potentially be prosecuted. Forced pregnancy qualifies as both a crime against humanity and a war crime under the ICC statute.¹⁶ There are particular challenges to prosecuting forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity and war crime. I will also address the claim that the ICC Statute does not go far enough - that forced pregnancy is genocide.

Part I: What Is Forced Pregnancy?

A. The Elements of Forced Pregnancy

To prove the crime of forced pregnancy, the prosecutor will have to establish that “[t]he perpetrator confined one or more women forcibly made pregnant, with the intent of affecting the ethnic composition of any population or carrying out other grave violations of international law.”¹⁷ This holds true whether the perpetrator is tried for forced pregnancy as a war crime or crime against humanity.¹⁸

¹⁵ ICC Statute, supra note 2, 7(2)(f).

¹⁶ ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(1)(g), 8(2)(b)(xxii).

As the above definition makes clear, the act reus of the crime of forced pregnancy is not the rape and impregnation¹⁹ but rather the unlawful confinement.²⁰ The perpetrator of forced pregnancy is the person who confined “one or more women forcibly made pregnant”²¹ not the one who necessarily committed the rape.²² As Kristen Boon notes, “The legal harm of forced pregnancy is that women are kept pregnant by means of confinement.”²³ The confinement must also be “to a certain location”²⁴ and the crucial period is between the time a woman is thought to be pregnant and the termination of the pregnancy.²⁵ To be sure, the prosecutor will have to prove that the woman confined was also “forcibly made pregnant” but in theory a woman could be forcibly made pregnant through artificial insemination or other modern technology.²⁶ Preventing a woman from ¹⁷ Finalized Draft Text of the Elements of Crimes, Preparatory Comm’n for the Int’l Crim. Ct., U.N. Doc. PCNICC/2001/1/Add.1, art. 7(i)(g)(4) & art. 8(2)(b)(xxii)-4 (2000), available at http://www.un.org/law/icc/statute/rules/english/1_add1e.pdf [hereinafter Elements].

¹⁸ See id.

¹⁹ See Boon, supra note 1, at 660.

²⁰ See ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(2)(f) (“Forced pregnancy” means the unlawful confinement of a woman forcibly made pregnant.”).

²¹ Elements, supra note 17, arts. 7(I)(g)(4)(1), 8(2)(b)(xxii)(1).

²² Some commentators seem confused on this point. See e.g., Jonathan M.H. Short, Sexual Violence as Genocide: The Developing Law of the International Criminal Tribunals and the International Criminal Court, 8 MICH. J. GENDER & L. 503, 512 (“Forced pregnancy is accomplished by impregnating a woman, whether by rape or other medical means, with the sperm of a man of a different ethnicity.”); see also Carpenter, supra note 7, at 445-49 (2000) (discussing failure of MacKinnon and others to differentiate forced impregnation from forced pregnancy).

²³ Boon, supra note 1, at 660.

²⁴ Elements, supra note 17, art. 8(2)(a)(vii)(2)(1).

²⁵ Boon, supra note 1, at 662-63.

²⁶ Anne Tierney Goldstein, Recognizing Forced Impregnation as a War Crime Under International Law: A Special Report of the International Program, Ctr. for Reproductive Law & Policy, p. 91 (1993); see also Carmela Buehler, The Crime of Forced Pregnancy in the Nascent System of Supranational Criminal Law, NEMESIS, Sept.-Oct. 2002, at 158, 166.

using contraceptives could be sufficient action to make a woman forcibly pregnant under the Statute.²⁷

The ICC Statute stipulates that the confinement must be “with the intent of affecting the ethnic composition of any population or carrying out other grave violations of international law.”²⁸ To prove forced pregnancy, therefore, it is not sufficient for the prosecutor to show that a woman forcibly made pregnant has been confined. The Croatian government would not be liable for forced pregnancy, for example, if it prevented a Croat raped and impregnated by Serbs from securing an abortion because the government presumably lacked the requisite mens rea. As a practical matter, the intent requirement places a limit on the identity of the perpetrators and victims - they must be members or thought to be members of different ethnic groups.²⁹

Forced pregnancy can also be prosecuted when the confinement was committed with the intent to perpetrate other grave violations of international law.³⁰ This alternate intent requirement broadens the scope of forced pregnancy considerably because there is no limit on the ethnicity of perpetrators or victims.³¹ Unfortunately, the ICC statute does not explain what it is meant by “grave violations.”³² Presumably the conduct covered would include confining a forcibly impregnated woman for the purpose of conducting ²⁷ Boon, supra note 1, at 661.

²⁸ ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(2)f, 8(2)(b)(xxii).

²⁹ Boon, supra note 1, at 663.

³⁰ ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(2)f, 8(2)(b)(xxii).

³¹ Boon, supra note 1, at 665.

³² The Statute does refer to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions. See ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 8 (2)(a). There is some evidence that sexual crimes would constitute grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions although this is not explicit in Article 8(2). See Jocelyn Campanaro, Women, War, and International Law: The Historical Treatment of Gender-Based War Crimes, 89 GEO. L.J. 2557, 2589 (2001).

scientific experiments as the Nazis did during World War II³³ or in order to enslave the mother and/or child.³⁴ Courts will likely have a great deal of discretion to shape the mens rea required for forced pregnancy because the ICC Statute does not impose any definite limitations.

B. Conceptual Problems in the Definition of Forced Pregnancy

The definition of forced pregnancy could be more precise in several respects. Although it is relatively clear that the act reus is the unlawful confinement, it is not as clear whether a woman must be forcibly made pregnant with the intent of “affecting the ethnic composition of any population or carrying out other grave violations of international law.”³⁵ A textual reading suggests that only the confinement is subject to the heightened requirement because a comma separates “forcibly made pregnant” from “with the intent of . . .” Thus, the prosecutor will not have to explore the reasons underlying a rape, for example.³⁶ Nevertheless, the ICC Statute could be clearer on this point.

Another important question is what the prosecutor has to prove with regards the pregnancy itself. Presumably he/she will have to present evidence that the pregnancy was not voluntary and was brought about by rape, for example. The person accused of forced pregnancy could, if he chose, produce evidence to show that this was not the case - even if he was not the one who impregnated the victim. To prove forced pregnancy, therefore, it will often be necessary to prove rape by a party not before the court. Given ³³ See Barbara Bedont & Katherine Hall Martinez, Ending Impunity for Gender Crimes under the International Criminal Court, BROWN JOURNAL OF WORLD AFFAIRS, Vol. VI, Iss. 1, 1999, at 65, 74.

³⁴ See ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(2)(c). Enslavement encompasses trafficking under the Statute. Id.

³⁵ Id., art. 7(2)(f).

³⁶ Proving political motives in rape cases is notoriously difficult as anyone with experience in asylum law can attest to. See generally Krishna R. Patel, Recognizing the Rape of Bosnian Women as Gender-Based Prosecution, 60 BROOK. L. REV. 929 (1994).

this, how much evidence will the prosecution have to present on this point? Will the judges have to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that a rape occurred to convict the perpetrator of forced pregnancy?³⁷ Perhaps the ICC will have to try the rape first and then move on to the forced pregnancy charge. If the rape can be treated as a mere part of the forced pregnancy proceeding, however, the alleged rapist's right to be tried in his presence would appear to be violated.³⁸ He would be denied the opportunity to contest the claims made against him or put forward the defense of his choosing.³⁹ There may also be implications for the presumption of innocence.⁴⁰ Yet, surely every time someone is accused of forced pregnancy, the prosecution cannot be expected to hold a rape trial as well. Perhaps the ICC framers assumed that the person who forcibly impregnated the victim would also be the one on trial for forced pregnancy although, as I have suggested, this may not be the case.⁴¹

The ICC's forced pregnancy provision also does not specify whether the alleged perpetrator must know that the woman he is confining was forcibly made pregnant. Is it enough that he should have known? As a general matter under the ICC statute, a wrongdoer must have knowledge of all the material elements of a crime⁴² where knowledge is defined as "awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events."⁴³ Presumably this means that the perpetrator of forced pregnancy must be aware that the woman he is confining is pregnant and also that the impregnation was forcible, whether it occurred through rape or some other means.

³⁷ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 66(3).

³⁸ Id. art. 63(1).

³⁹ See generally id. art. 67.

⁴⁰ Id. art. 66(1).

⁴¹ See also Carmela Buehler, supra note 26, at 166.

⁴² ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 30.

⁴³ Id. art. 30(3)

Considering that he may well not have been present during the rape, the perpetrator might argue that he could not know the circumstances of the pregnancy. This argument is more convincing than it appears at first glance. The court, after all, has to make its own determination on whether a woman was forcibly made pregnant, and this determination involves a mixture of fact and law. The court will presumably consider legal concepts such as “force” and “consent.”⁴⁴ Wouldn’t a suspect have to have made a similar determination to “know” that the woman was forcibly made pregnant? The ICC views knowledge as actual awareness and in forced pregnancy cases, prosecutors might be hard-pressed to demonstrate sufficient awareness.

C. Relation to National Abortion Laws

Perhaps the most puzzling part of the ICC’s treatment of forced pregnancy is that the definition “shall not in any way be interpreted as affecting national laws relating to pregnancy.”⁴⁵ This language was added to Article 7.2(f) on the insistence of the Vatican and states opposed to abortion.⁴⁶ These delegations to the preparatory conference were concerned that forced pregnancy would be used to supplant anti-abortion laws and endanger Catholic hospitals that refused to provide abortions.⁴⁷ This language ensures that the ICC will not recognize a general right to abortion.

If there is no right to obtain an abortion, then how to make sense of the forced pregnancy provision in the ICC statute? Rape and unlawful confinement are already ⁴⁴ Buehler, supra note 26, at 167. The ICTY’s use of such concepts has not been without controversy. See generally Adrienne Kalosieh, Consent to Genocide? The ICTY’s Improper Use of the Consent Paradigm to Prosecute Genocidal Rape in Foca, 24 WOMEN’S RTS. L. REP. 121 (2003).

⁴⁵ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7.2(f).

⁴⁶ See Mahnoush H. Arsanjani, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 93 AM. J. INT’L. L. 22, 31 (1999); see also Boon, supra note 1, at 659; Buehler, supra note 26, at 165.

⁴⁷ Boon, supra note 1, at 659.

prohibited under the ICC statute.⁴⁸ Boon argues that that criminalization of forced pregnancy evidences respect for a woman’s bodily integrity and sexual autonomy,⁴⁹ but her argument could just as easily apply in the domestic context to oppose all regulation of abortion, and yet, the forced pregnancy provision “shall not in any way be interpreted as affecting national laws relating to pregnancy.”⁵⁰ More convincingly, Carmela Buehler argues that an unwanted pregnancy greatly exacerbates the pain of the rape.⁵¹ She writes, “If she is forced to bear the child as a consequence of her confinement, this is a long process during which the child will always be a reminder of her ordeal.”⁵² Others have speculated that “[p]regnancy may worsen the long-term of impact of rape on the victim by eliminating any chance of maintaining acceptance by a husband or family.”⁵³ Perhaps the best way to understand forced pregnancy under the ICC Statute is that women should be able to terminate “forced” pregnancies⁵⁴ whereas it is up to individual nation-states to determine if abortion should be available in other situations.

There are two problems with this analysis. As previously noted, a woman can be made forcibly pregnant without necessarily having been raped. It seems inadequate to justify the crime of forced pregnancy, therefore, on the assumption that the crime occurs pursuant to a rape. Indeed, if Boon is correct, a woman can be forcibly made pregnant when she is denied access birth control.⁵⁵ If this is indeed the case, I find it hard to ⁴⁸ Rape is prohibited as both a crime against humanity and a war crime. See ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(1)(g), 8(b)(xxii). Unlawful confinement is a war crime. Id. art. 8(2)(vi).

⁴⁹ Boon, supra note 1, at 668.

⁵⁰ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7.2(f).

⁵¹ Buehler, supra note 26, at 172.

⁵² Id.

⁵³ See Carpenter, supra note 7, at 435.

⁵⁴ Boon states that this right may already be guaranteed under Article 12 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, but this is a controversial position. See Boon, supra note 1, at 666.

⁵⁵ Boon, supra note 1, at 661; see also Buehler, supra note 26, at 8.

believe that the reason this woman should be allowed to terminate her pregnancy is because the pregnancy would represent an ongoing reminder of the harm done to her in denying her access to contraception. The indignity central to the crime of forced pregnancy is not being forcibly made pregnant - which will usually be punishable as rape or some other crime⁵⁶ - but rather that a woman is being forced to carry a child against her will. If it were otherwise, the Statute would criminalize “forced impregnation” not “forced pregnancy.”

Second, and perhaps more important, if the ICC Statute recognized a woman’s fundamental right to terminate a pregnancy that was caused by rape, for example, then the Statute would not have noted that forced pregnancy “shall not in any way be interpreted as affecting national laws relating to pregnancy.”⁵⁷ There is no guarantee that national abortion laws will not infringe on a woman’s right to terminate a forced pregnancy. This is hardly surprising as the provision needed to satisfy constituents that were fervently opposed to abortion.⁵⁸ Boon argues that most national abortion laws already recognize an exception for forced pregnancies.⁵⁹ Even if this is so, however, the ICC Statute seems to concede that nations have the right to set their own abortion laws, and this would presumably trump any obligations nations had under earlier treaties or customary international law.⁶⁰

The consequence of the forced pregnancy compromise is that the ICC appears to have created a state action exception in forced pregnancy cases. If nations are allowed to ⁵⁶ Impregnating someone against their will via artificial insemination, for example, presumably falls under the Statute’s prohibition on using medical science against the interests of the patient. See ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 8(b)(xi).

⁵⁷ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7.2(f).

⁵⁸ See Arsanjani, supra note 46, at 31; see also Buehler, supra note 26, at 165; Boon, supra note 1, at 659.

⁵⁹ See Boon, supra note 1, at 666.

⁶⁰ See generally Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties art. 30, Jan. 27, 1980, 1155 U.N.T.S. 331.

restrict abortion however they wish, then they can presumably confine women in order to prevent them from having abortions. A person confining a woman forcibly made pregnant pursuant to a national law that prohibited abortion, therefore, would be immune from prosecution by the ICC. If a private individual were to affect the confinement, however, he too might be immune from prosecution depending on whether his conduct would be sanctioned by the state.⁶¹ The ICC Statute never explains exactly what constitutes “unlawful confinement” in the forced pregnancy context, and given this, the ICC seems obliged to consider whether suspects have violated their own nation’s abortion laws.

This apparent deference given to national law in forced pregnancy prosecutions is in stark contrast to how other crimes are prosecuted by the ICC. As a general matter, the ICC will only apply domestic law as a last resort, after having examined the ICC Statute and international materials.⁶² A worrying possibility is that the ICC might have to apply national abortion laws even when they are fundamentally discriminatory or sexist. While applying such laws is forbidden by Article 21 (3) of the ICC Statute, the fact that forced pregnancy “shall not in any way be interpreted as affecting national laws relating to pregnancy”⁶³ suggests that the ICC Statute requires that enormous deference be given to national abortion laws. As a practical matter, it will be difficult - if not impossible - to charge a person who lives in a society that does not permit abortion with the crime of forced pregnancy under the ICC Statute. Citizens who live in states where abortion is permitted would of course be subject to the ICC’s jurisprudence. This disparity can be explained by the fact that the core of forced pregnancy is that women cannot be prevented from terminating unwanted pregnancies, and nations who reject abortion appear to have been successful in carving out an exception for themselves in the Statute.

⁶¹ That is, if it permitted the confinement of abortion-seeking woman by her family, for example, and not only the government.

⁶² See ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 21(1).

⁶³ Id. art. 7(2)(f) (emphasis added).

Part II: The Manifestations of Forced Pregnancy

The ICC Statute recognizes forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity as well as a war crime.⁶⁴ Many commentators have also argued that forced pregnancy is genocide⁶⁵ although the ICC does not explicitly treat it as such. Forced pregnancy is defined identically in Article 7 (the ICC's crimes against humanity provision) and Article 8 (the ICC's war crimes provision), but the elements of forced pregnancy differ depending on the context. There are particular challenges depending on whether forced pregnancy is prosecuted as a crime against humanity, war crime, or genocide.

A. Forced Pregnancy as a Crime Against Humanity

To be convicted of the crime against humanity of forced pregnancy, the perpetrator's conduct must meet the definition of forced pregnancy in Article 7(2)(f) as outlined above. In addition, the crime must be part of a "widespread or systematic attack directed against a civilian population"⁶⁶ and the perpetrator must know that his conduct was part of or intended to be part of this widespread or systematic attack.⁶⁷

⁶⁴ See ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(i)(g), 8(2)(b)(xxii).

⁶⁵ See e.g., ALLEN, supra note 7, at 91; MacKinnon, supra note 7, at 11.

⁶⁶ Elements, supra note 17, art. 7 (I)(g)(4)(2).

⁶⁷ See id. art. 7(I)(g)(4)(3).

The ICC Statute defines “attack directed against a civilian population” as a “course of conduct involving the multiple commission of acts [such as murder] against any civilian population, pursuant to or in furtherance of a State or organizational policy to commit such attack.”⁶⁸ Forced pregnancy then must occur against a backdrop of violence where murder, rape, and other enumerated crimes⁶⁹ are prevalent. Although there need not be a full-blown war,⁷⁰ the attack must be “widespread or systematic” but not necessarily systematic and widespread.⁷¹ This is the case for all crimes against humanity.⁷²

While the ICC Statute does not define either “widespread” or “systematic,” the former requirement seems to suggest that an attack must be of a relatively large scale while systematic refers to the element of coordinated planning.⁷³ To prosecute forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity, therefore, not only must there be the crime occur as part of an attack, but the attack must be of a large scale or alternatively involve a high degree of coordination (and the perpetrator must know of the attack and his role in it). There also appears to be a limit on the identity of the perpetrator because the attack of which he is a part must be “pursuant to or in furtherance of a State or organizational policy.”⁷⁴ This would rule out “free-lancers” who decide to commit crimes on their own.⁷⁵

Prosecuting forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity is problematic in a number of respects. The act reus of forced pregnancy is unlawful confinement and ⁶⁸ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(2)(a).

⁶⁹ Id. arts. 7(1)(a)-(k). Forced pregnancy is one of the qualifying crimes listed under 7(1)(g).

⁷⁰ See Buehler, supra note 26, at 168.

⁷¹ See id.

⁷² ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(1).

⁷³ David Luban, A Theory of Crimes Against Humanity, 29 YALE J. INT’L L. 85, 108 (2004).

⁷⁴ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(2)(a).

⁷⁵ Luban, supra note 73, at 96.

presumably the confinement could occur away from any widespread or systematic attack - forced pregnancy is a crime that often occurs in isolation.⁷⁶ It is conceivable that in many cases the confiner would be unaware of the circumstances of the systematic or widespread attack. How can forced pregnancy truly be part of an attack, moreover, when the unlawful confinement will often occur far away from the original attack?⁷⁷ While crimes like murder are often part of attacks on civilian populations, forced pregnancy is ultimately a crime committed against an individual woman. This has led some to suggest that the attack requirement must be loosened for sex-related crimes against humanity like forced pregnancy.⁷⁸

The ICC Statute also does not address the issue of whether the prosecution would have to prove that there was a national policy to commit force pregnancies. Without such a policy, the perpetrator might not be acting “pursuant to or in furtherance of a State or organizational policy.”⁷⁹ The Statute states that it is the attack itself that must be “pursuant to or in furtherance of a State or organizational policy” whereas the forced pregnancy merely needs to be a part of the attack.⁸⁰ But how can forced pregnancy be part of this attack unless there is at least implicit state approval of the crime? If history is any guide, prosecutors might be hard-pressed to find the requisite evidence of state

⁷⁶ Cf. Brook Sari Moshan, Women War, and Words: The Gender Component in the Permanent International Criminal Court’s Definition of Crimes Against Humanity, 22 FORDHAM INT’L L.J. 154, 183 (1998) (arguing that rape and other sex-related crimes occur in isolation and thus might not constitute crimes against humanity under the Statute).

⁷⁷ What if the unlawful confinement was to occur in Serbia, for example, but the forced impregnation and rape occurred in Bosnia?

⁷⁸ See Moshan, supra note 76, at 183.

⁷⁹ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(2)(a).

⁸⁰ Compare Elements, supra note 17, 8(2)(e)(vi)(4)(3) with ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(I)(g)(4)(3).

sanction.⁸¹ It will be interesting to see in which instances the ICC will prosecute forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity.

B. Forced Pregnancy as War Crime

The ICC Statute allows forced pregnancy to be prosecuted as a war crime if the crime occurs in the context of (or is associated with) either an international conflict⁸² or a non-international conflict.⁸³ Forced pregnancy is one of the war crimes in Article 8 that are “serious violations of the laws and customs”⁸⁴ of international law but not “grave breaches” of the Geneva Conventions.⁸⁵ This does not necessarily mean that the ICC views forced pregnancy as any less serious than other war crimes, but rather, under the Geneva Conventions (which form the basis of modern prosecution of war crimes), rape and other sex crimes are not acknowledged as “grave breaches.”⁸⁶ The perpetrator of forced pregnancy must be aware of the factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict whether the conflict is international or internal.⁸⁷

Armed conflict is not precisely defined under the ICC Statute. However, the Statute makes clear that “armed conflicts” are not “situations of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence or other acts of a similar ⁸¹ In Bosnia, there were documented incidents of forced pregnancy, but these incidents were not tied to any official Serbian policy of impregnating women and preventing them from terminating their pregnancies. See Final Report of The Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), U.N. SCOR, para. 248, U.N. Doc. S/1994/674 (1994). The Final Report also states, “[A] systematic rape policy existed in certain areas, but it remains to be proven whether such an overall policy existed which was to apply to all non-Serbs.” Id. This does not mean that there was no policy but does suggest that actual evidence of such policies is not always readily available.

⁸² ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 8.2(b)(xxii).

⁸³ Id. art. 8.2(e)(vi).

⁸⁴ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 8(2)(b).

⁸⁵ Id. art. (2)(a).

⁸⁶ See Buehler, supra note 26, at 169.

⁸⁷ Elements, supra note 17, arts. 8(2)(b)(xxii)(4), 8(2)(e)(vi)(4).

nature.”⁸⁸ War crimes occur only where there is a protracted armed conflict between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups.⁸⁹ From this, it seems evident that the ICC is precluded from prosecuting war crimes when there are not two hostile parties. If a government were to launch an attack on a population that had not taken up arms, its agents could probably not be charged with war crimes (although they could certainly be tried for crimes against humanity). This is regrettable from the perspective of justice, but the ICC only has jurisdiction over persons “for the most serious crimes of international concern” (emphasis added).⁹⁰ Presumably domestic courts could prosecute war crimes such as forced pregnancy that do not occur in the context of international conflicts or serious internal conflicts.

The elements of forced pregnancy as a war crime are more lax than those of forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity. The perpetrator need only be aware that an armed conflict exists - he need not know that there is a “widespread or systematic” attack or his particular role in the attack.⁹¹ The armed conflict and the crimes committed therein need not be “in furtherance of a state or organizational policy.”⁹² Moreover, the forced pregnancy does not have to be committed as a part of the armed conflict⁹³ - it merely has to be associated with it.⁹⁴ As long as an armed conflict involves the large-scale or purposeful commission of war crimes,⁹⁵ and the perpetrator of forced pregnancy had some connection to the conflict, he can be convicted for committing a war crime.

⁸⁸ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 8(2)(f).

⁸⁹ Id.

⁹⁰ Id. art. 1.

⁹¹ Compare Elements, supra note 17, art. 8(2)(e)(vi)(4)(3), with Elements, supra note 17, art. 7(I)(g)(4)(3).

⁹² ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 7(2)(a).

⁹³ See Elements, supra note 17, art. 7(I)(g)(4)(2).

⁹⁴ See id. arts. 8(2)(b)(xxii)(4), 8(2)(e)(vi)(4)(3).

⁹⁵ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 8(1).

The ICC's treatment of forced pregnancy as a war crime would seem to still preclude prosecuting free-lancers. This is potentially troublesome. If someone takes advantage of the existence of an armed conflict, where law and order has broken down, he should not be able to escape punishment simply because his conduct was not strictly "associated" with the armed conflict. However, given prior jurisprudence before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY), the Court is likely to interpret the "armed conflict" requirement quite liberally. In Tadic, for example, the ICTY wrote that there is a nexus between conduct and an armed conflict if an act is not unrelated to the armed conflict and was not done for the perpetrator's purely personal motives.⁹⁶ Under this precedent, the ICC will likely be able to reach even perpetrators whose actions were tangentially connected to armed conflicts. Most prosecutions of forced pregnancy will likely be under the ICC's war crimes provision.

C. Forced Pregnancy as Genocide

The ICC Statute does not explicitly treat forced pregnancy as genocide. The Statute lists five acts that constitute genocide when committed with the intent to "destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group," and forced pregnancy is not one of these acts.⁹⁷ This seems to stand to reason. As one commentator has put it, "How is it possible to view the creation of human life as genocidal? How precisely is a group destroyed by the creation of individuals?"⁹⁸ Moreover, the notion that forced pregnancy is genocide forces us to ignore several biological realities.⁹⁹ When a woman is ⁹⁶ Prosecutor v. Tadic, Case No.IT-94-1-I, Judgment and Opinion, ¶ 634 (May 7, 1997).

⁹⁷ See ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 6.

⁹⁸ Carpenter, supra note 4, at 218, 222.

⁹⁹ See generally Salzman, supra note 10, at 364-65.

forcibly made pregnant with the intent of affecting the ethnic composition of a group,¹⁰⁰ the ethnic composition of the group is not really affected because the child will still in part belong to the mother's group. Children, after all, receive equal parts genetic material from mother and father.

To some advocates, however, genocide can be equated with the pollution of the bloodline.¹⁰¹ Catherine MacKinnon has claimed: "Croatian and Muslim women are being raped, and then denied abortions, to help make a Serbian state by making Serbian babies."¹⁰² MacKinnon's argument is that in patriarchal societies like Serbia, where the ethnic identity is based on the ethnicity of the father, forced pregnancy is used to increase the population of one group at the expense of the other.¹⁰³ Siobhan Fisher has put the point more generally: "When reproduction is used to proliferate members of one group and simultaneously to prevent the reproduction of members of another, it is a form of destruction."¹⁰⁴ As long as the victim of forced pregnancy is carrying the child of the enemy, she cannot give birth to children of her own group, and after she gives birth she may be too devastated to bear children of her group in the future.¹⁰⁵ What is important then might not be the genetic reality that the children of forced pregnancy belong to both groups, but rather the perceptions of perpetrators and victims.¹⁰⁶

This view has some support in the Akayesu decision before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR).¹⁰⁷ In dicta, the Tribunal wrote that forced ¹⁰⁰ ICC Statute, supra note 2, arts. 7(2)f, 8(2)(b)(xxii).

¹⁰¹ See Darren Anne Nebesar, Note, Gender-Based Violence as a Weapon of War, 4 U.C. DAVIS J. INT'L L. & POL'Y 148, 154 (2000).

¹⁰² MacKinnon, supra note 7, at 11.

¹⁰³ See id.; see also Salzman, supra note 10, at 365.

¹⁰⁴ Fisher, supra note 7, at 121.

¹⁰⁵ See Buehler, supra note 26, at 171.

¹⁰⁶ Salzman, supra note 10, at 365.

¹⁰⁷ Prosecutor v. Akayesu, Case No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment (Sep. 2, 1998).

pregnancy can be seen as genocide when it is intended to prevent births within a group.¹⁰⁸ The ICTR wrote: “In patriarchal societies, where membership of a group is determined by the identity of the father, an example of a measure intended to prevent births within a group is the case where, during rape, a woman of the said group is deliberately impregnated by a man of another group, with the intent to have her give birth to a child who will consequently not belong to its mother's group.”¹⁰⁹ Like the ICTR, the ICC recognizes that the imposition of measures intended to prevent births is genocide.¹¹⁰ Forced pregnancy then, if performed with the requisite intent, could potentially be prosecuted as genocide under Article 6(d) of the Statute.¹¹¹

Although the ICC may choose to read Article 6(d) to allow for the prosecution of forced pregnancy as genocide, there are strong reasons that it should not do so. The perpetrator of forced pregnancy is able to affect the ethnic composition of a particular group only if the group views the offspring as a product of “the other.” Carpenter writes, “To function as genocide, the children (and the mothers who bore children “of the enemy”) must be seen by the group as alien to the group.”¹¹² To treat forced pregnancy as genocide is to substantiate the myth that identity is determined solely by the ethnicity of the father; it is to accept the notion that the mother’s ethnicity is erased from the offspring.¹¹³ Such views have real-world consequences, most notably on the “children of ¹⁰⁸ Id. ¶ 507.

¹⁰⁹ Id.

¹¹⁰ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 6(d).

¹¹¹ Buehler also speculates that forced pregnancy can be prosecuted as genocide under Article 6(b) – where the qualifying action is causing serious bodily or mental harm. See generally Buehler, supra note 26, at 170-71. While Buehler is undoubtedly correct that forced pregnancy causes bodily or mental harm, forced pregnancy is only the destruction of a group in so far as it is seen by the group as such. See discussion infra.

¹¹² Carpenter, supra note 7, at 444.

¹¹³ See id. at 443.

the enemy,” who inevitably end up alienated from both cultures.¹¹⁴ The overall treatment of such children is of deep stigma,¹¹⁵ and the women who give birth to them are often isolated from their own culture and community.¹¹⁶ The preamble of the ICC Statute proclaims that the state parties are “conscious that all peoples are united by common bonds, their cultures pieced together in a shared heritage.” Treating forced pregnancy as genocide is to validate the notion that a child must be ethnically and culturally pure to belong to a particular people.

The intent required to commit genocide also appears to be at odds with the intent required for forced pregnancy. To commit genocide, one must have the intent to “destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group.”¹¹⁷ To commit forced pregnancy, however, the perpetrator must have the intention to affect the ethnic composition of a population or carry out other violations of international law by means of unlawful confinement.¹¹⁸ The intent required for forced pregnancy is usually readily inferred from the facts of the confinement. When a pregnant woman is held until she gives birth to a “child of the enemy” and then let go, this would seem to suggest that the confinement was for the purpose of affecting the ethnic composition of her group. The same facts cannot also give rise to genocide unless having the intent to affect the ethnic composition of a group also means the perpetrator has the intent to “destroy in whole or in part.” Such an interpretation, however, would turn every war crime and crime against humanity of forced pregnancy into genocide. Apart from the fact that it is ¹¹⁴ See generally Carpenter, supra note 4, at 228-32.

¹¹⁵ Id. at 228. Carpenter goes on to write with regards the children born in Bosnia: “The children who were born were nearly always rejected by their mothers and communities, killed, abandoned, or cared for by orphanages and in some cases denied citizenship.” Id.

¹¹⁶ See Buehler, supra note 26, at 170; see also Nebesar, supra note 101, at 155 (“The woman’s scar is not just her own, yet she alone is shunned for having it.”).

¹¹⁷ ICC Statute, supra note 2, art. 6(a).

¹¹⁸ See id. arts. 7(2)f, 8(2)(b)(xxii).

bizarre to think of a confinement of a person (pregnant or not) being committed with genocidal intent, the framers of the ICC could not have intended such a result.

Moreover, if one group wished to destroy another, forced pregnancy would probably not be the weapon of choice. According to one account from a rape camp, women who were to bear “Chetnik babies” were segregated from the rest, received extra food and other privileges, and were examined by gynecologists.¹¹⁹ Forced pregnancy is a horrible crime, but it is hard to read these facts as proof of genocide. Presumably a group intent on genocide would not confine women of the enemy group and let them go – they would kill them. MacKinnon has speculated that the idea of forced pregnancy is to create a “fifth column” in the enemy population, but the children of forced pregnancy can assimilate and are just as likely to be victims of murder and genocide as anyone else.¹²⁰ As Carpenter has argued, “It seems conceptually meaningless to rely on the imagination of perpetrators to label a child’s ethnicity when in fact the child’s experience and identity may be embedded in a different community.”¹²¹ While the ICC is not precluded from treating forced pregnancy as genocide, there are legal and practical considerations that justify the ICC’s Statute’s position in not explicitly treating it as such. The ICC should focus on prosecuting forced pregnancy as a war crime and crime against humanity.

¹¹⁹ Salzman, supra note 10, at 359.

¹²⁰ Carpenter, supra note 4, at 232.

¹²¹ Id.

Conclusion

International courts are increasingly concerned with crimes committed against women such as forced pregnancy and forced marriage.¹²² At the same time, the ICC and other institutions¹²³ have yet to try these crimes. Although it is a welcome development that the rights of women are no longer of secondary concern to international law, we cannot be sure how courts will treat these crimes. The ICC will have substantial discretion in analyzing forced pregnancy because the work of the ad hoc tribunals and domestic jurisprudence is of limited use in dealing with a crime that has only recently been recognized.

In this article, I have attempted to demonstrate some of the potential flaws in the ICC's treatment of forced pregnancy. In Part I, I focused on ambiguities in the definition, particularly with regards the act reus and mens rea of the crime. Forced pregnancy is not actually one crime - but two: There must both be a forcible impregnation and an unlawful confinement. The perpetrator of forced pregnancy is the one who commits the latter crime. However, since one cannot be convicted of forced pregnancy without the impregnation occurring, the prosecution will also have to prove that the former crime occurred. This is potentially problematic since the rights of third-parties may be implicated in the proceeding, and it is unclear how much knowledge the perpetrator of forced pregnancy must have as to the origins of the pregnancy. We also have every reason to question whether the Statute's deference to national abortion laws is appropriate given that the criminalization of forced pregnancy is supposed to protect a woman's right to not be pregnant against her will.

¹²² For a discussion of "forced marriage" before the Special Court of Sierra Leone, see generally Bianaifer Nowrojee, Making the Invisible War Crime Visible: Post-Conflict Justice for Sierra Leone's Rape Victims, 18 HARV. HUM. RTS. J. 85, 100-02 (2005). Forced marriages qualify as "other inhumane acts" under the Crimes Against Humanity Provisions of the Special Court's Statute. See id. at 102.

¹²³ Defendants have been charged with "forced marriage" by the Special Court for Sierra Leone but no judgments have yet been made. See generally Press Release, Special Court for Sierra Leone, Prosecutor Welcomes Arraignment of RUF and AFRC Indictes on Charges Related to Forced Marriage (May 17, 2004), available at: <http://www.sc-sl.org/prosecutor-051704.html>.

In Part II of this paper, I turned to the special difficulties posed in prosecuting forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity and war crime. Given the special nature of forced pregnancy, it will be hard to prove that the crime was committed as part of a "widespread or systematic" attack. The perpetrator who confines the victim may have a credible argument that he is unaware of the particulars of any attack, let alone that his action was pursuant to any organizational policy. Indeed, treating forced pregnancy as a crime against humanity moves the inquiry away from the harm done to an individual woman to an inquiry into an individual's complicity in a larger unlawful scheme. Prosecuting forced pregnancy as a war crime is not as problematic since the perpetrator need not be furthering some governmental policy - his conduct simply needs to be loosely associated with an armed conflict. We can expect to see most prosecutions of forced pregnancy to be under the war crimes provisions of the ICC Statute.

Lastly, I argued that while forced pregnancy can potentially be read as genocide under Article 6(d) of the ICC Statute (i.e. as a measure intended to prevent births in another group), the ICC should be reluctant to treat forced pregnancy as genocide. Forced pregnancy contributes to the destruction of a group only to the extent that we accept the notion that children must belong to one group or another. While forced pregnancy is a horrible crime, the action of detaining a woman so she can be forced to give birth does not rise to the level of genocide, and courts will be unlikely to infer genocidal intent from the facts of a forced pregnancy. Forced pregnancy inflicts very real pain on individual women, but it has little to do with the destruction of a group.

In criminalizing forced pregnancy, the ICC is sending a clear message to the world that women cannot be treated as mere “vessel[s] of reproduction.”¹²⁴ At the same time, many challenges await the court as it begins to prosecute forced pregnancy. The ICC must strike a balance between vindicating victims and respecting the rights of suspects accused of this new crime.

¹²⁴ See Carpenter, supra note 7, at 443.